PRAYER.

The Chaplain of the Senate, Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy, holy, holy Lord God of Hosts! Let the whole earth be full of Thy glory. As sovereign Thou reignest in heaven and rulest upon the earth. Thou holdest the seas in the hollow of Thy hand and takest up the isles as a very little thing. Thou hearest the voice of the feeblest weeper and the shouting of the multitudinous nations. Thou dost mark the footsteps of the obscurest traveler and the acts of those who are in the highest trust and power of the nation. O God of the nation, we pray that Thou wilt spread over this Capitol the wing of Thy protecting providence. We thank Thee for the opening of Congress, that the assembled wisdom of the land has again convened in this high conclave of the nation to deliberate upon interests to affect the welfare of thirty million people. Oh, grant that wisdom and grace and strength may be imparted to Thy servants, the Senators and to the Representatives of Congress, that all the words they utter, and the enactments that go forth from this high place of power, may be approved of Heaven. Let Thy blessing rest, we pray Thee, upon all Thy servants, and grant that life and health may be continued to them, and that death shall not be permitted to invade this legislative body. We pray that Thou wilt bless the President of the United States and make him faithful to execute the high trusts confided to him. Bless the members of the Cabinet, and may they be gifted, highly gifted, with wisdom and foresight. Bless the Army and Navy of the United States, and let all our defenders have courage and patience and endurance. Bless the judges in our land. May they deal justly and love mercy. Bless the four millions of the freedmen in this country, and prepare them for the rights of manhood and the privileges of citizenship. Bless all the people and have their interests in Thy safe care and keeping; and may all the States of this great Union be prepared to dwell together in unity and concord, and may the God of peace overshadow and bless and protect and save us now and evermore. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is none.

Mr. SUMNER. If not, and if it is in order, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1, entitled "A bill to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. SUMNER called for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those in favor—

Mr. SUMNER. Before the motion is put I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the condition of that bill. It will be remembered that it was introduced on the first day of the last session; that it was the subject of repeated discussions in this Chamber; that it was more than once referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, by whose chairman it was reported back to the Senate. At several different stages of the discussion it was supposed that we were about to reach a final vote. The country expected that vote. It was not had. It ought to have been had. And now, sir, I think that the best way is for the Senate in this very first hour of its coming together to put that bill on its passage. It has been thoroughly debated. Every Senator here has made up his mind on the question. There is nothing more to be said on either side. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that the vote shall be taken without one further word of discussion; but I do think that the Senate ought not to allow the bill to be postponed. We ought to seize this first occasion to put the bill on its passage. The country expects it; the country will rejoice and be grateful if you will signalize this first day of your coming together by this beautiful and generous act.

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he desires to force a discussion on that measure to-day. It is, of course, a very important one, and he is aware that there are differences of opinion upon it. I differ with him much. That bill cannot be passed without discussion, and it should be a full discussion, for it involves principles, and I ask the Senator from Massachusetts not to urge it immediately. Let him set a time for its consideration—any time when those members of the Senate who desire to debate it will be prepared to do so—and not press it before the morning hour has expired of the first day of the session of the Senate. I object to its consideration now, and I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to name a day for that purpose. [After a pause.] He insists upon it now. Well, then, it will have to be discussed. I would rather that so important a question should be postponed until some day when we come here prepared for business, and not when we come here for the purpose of settling the preliminaries of business.

Mr. MORRILL. I agree with all that has been said by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts about the propriety of an early consideration of this measure. It is true, that having been charged by the committee with presenting the measure to the consideration of the Senate at the last session, I did call the attention of this body on more than one occasion to the importance of its consideration, but was not able to secure the final action of the body; and in the continuance of the duty with which I felt charged by the committee, it was my purpose to move for the action of the Senate at the earliest moment when I supposed it would be in order to do so. I was under the impression that the unfinished business of the two Houses must lie over under the rule for the first six days of the session—in other words, it would not be in order to take this measure up until the expiration of six days. I do not know that the rule is susceptible of that construction, but under that construction it was my purpose to do no more to-day than to give notice of an intention to bring this bill to the consideration of the Senate at the earliest possible moment when it could receive its attention, but I should be very glad, if it is within the reach of the Senate, to consider it now, and very much obliged to my honorable friend from Massachusetts for relieving me from any further duty in regard to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, according to the Constitution of the United States, I believe—

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand the Senator from California to object to the consideration of the bill now. Does not a single objection carry it over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is a violation of the rule to take it up now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware has the floor. The Chair will state that the only question suggested by the Senator from Maine, as a question of order, in the opinion of the Chair, must come under the 21st joint rule, which is, that—

"After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of Congress, all bills, resolutions, or reports which originated in either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

It does not, in the opinion of the Chair, exclude the Senate from considering bills prior to the six days. It requires that after the six days they "shall be resumed." If the opinion of the Chair is wrong, he will be subject, of course, to correction. The Chair, however, is referred to a previous decision at a former session. A motion was made to take up a bill under like circumstances:

"Mr. PEARCE raised a question of order whether the motion was in order under the 21st joint rule, and the Vice President decided that the motion was not in order."—Senate Journal, Thirty-Fifth Congress, second session, page 39.

In view of that decision the Chair will reverse its decision, and decide that this motion, if the question of order is made, is not now in order, on the authority of the precedent formerly set.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it in order now to introduce a bill with the consent of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is, if there be no objection. The title of the bill will be read for information.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 452) to prevent and punish the illegal appointment of officers of the United States; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GRIMES. The committees have not been appointed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought they were continued; if not, let it be laid on the table.

The bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S.

No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices; which was read twice by its title, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

EDWARD McPHERSON, Esq., Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar and delivered the following message:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have been directed to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

The House has passed a resolution directing the appointment of a committee on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and has appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN of Illinois, Mr. J. S. MORRILL of Vermont, and Mr. W. E. FINCK of Ohio, the committee on the part of the House.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. MORGAN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill in relation to the employment of apprentices in the commercial marine of the United States.

FRENCH TROOPS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence or other information in his possession in regard to the following points:

1. Whether the French Emperor has complied with his announcement toward the United States to withdraw one third of the French troops in Mexico during the month of November last.

2. Whether any number of said French troops has been withdrawn in accordance with that announcement.

3. Whether, if, as it appears, no troops have been withdrawn, the French Emperor has offered any explanation or apology for his course, or whether he has proposed a different understanding by which the withdrawal will be delayed.

4. What action, if any, the Government has taken to see that understanding carried out.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that lie over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over.

SUPERINTENDENT OF PRINTING.

Mr. LANE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the election of Superintendent of Public Printing by a concurrent vote of both Houses of Congress, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that there is at present no committee to which the resolution can be referred.

Mr. LANE. Let the resolution lie on the table, to be referred when the committee shall have been appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, no objection being made.

WIDOW OF HON. J. H. LANE.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the consent of the Senate to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the compensation fund of the Senate, to Mrs. ——— Lane, widow of Hon. James H. Lane, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Kansas, the amount of compensation due the deceased at the time of his death.

I suppose this resolution had better lie on the table until the appointment of the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over, having received one reading to-day.

RECESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL, (at a quarter before one o'clock.) I move that the Senate take a recess until a quarter past one o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, we may get the message. I understand that our committee have gone to the President, and I think we ought to await their report before adjourning. It is possible we may have the message to-day. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore resumed the chair at fifteen minutes past one o'clock p. m.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON PRESIDENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the joint committee appointed to inform the President of the United States that the two Houses of Congress were organized and prepared to receive any communication which he might be pleased to make to them, have performed the duty to which they were appointed, and the President replied that he would communicate to the two Houses immediately in writing.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced the passage by the House of a bill (H. R. No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move, Mr. President, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 828.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to know what that bill is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. House bill No. 828 is a bill to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered the day on which it is received.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON, the Private Secretary of the President of the United States, appeared below the bar and said:

Mr. President: I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having received the message, handed it to the Secretary, and directed that it be read.

The Secretary of the Senate, JOHN W. FORNEY, Esq., read the President's annual message. [The message will be published in the Appendix.]

PRINTING OF THE MESSAGE.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the message of the President of the United States, with the reports of the heads of Departments, and without the accompanying documents, be printed, and that three thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

FINANCE REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received, and will take this opportunity to lay before the Senate, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that that report be laid upon the table until the committees are appointed, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be taken if there be no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. If there is no further business, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 3, 1866.

In conformity to the Constitution, the Thirty-Ninth Congress of the United States of America convened this day in its second session. At twelve o'clock m., Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives, a member from the State of Indiana, called the House to order.

Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, the Chaplain, offered up prayer in these words:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, Creator and Preserver of all things, and Redeemer of men, as the only proper object of worship we approach Thee once more with our offerings of thanksgiving, praise, and prayer. Thanks be to God for this good hour, so full of the evidences of Thy remembering love and Thy protecting care. Through the months in which we have been separated from each other Thou hast watched over Thy servants, these public men; Thou hast guarded their lives, their health, and their interests well, watching them in all their course; Thou hast protected their families from sickness and disaster, and the death shadow has fallen during all these months only on one of the families connected with this Congress. We thank Thee, O God, that Thou hast preserved them all but that. We pray Thy blessing, and for the consolations that Thou alone canst give to the friends of him whom Thou hast taken away. We thank Thee that Thou didst nerve up these men so that they have done a duty while absent from this spot more important in its results, as we trust, than what they were able to do while here, even. We bless Thee that Thou gavest them the wisdom and the strength to enlighten the people on the great questions at issue before the country, and we thank Thee for that magnificent uprising of a free people, instructed as they were to make right decisions in reference to every great question presented, so that when their decisions were uttered we knew that it was not in vain to depend upon the intelligence of the American people. We thank Thee, O God, that Thou hast been pleased to bring these men together once more, to enter upon their duties thus strengthened and encouraged by all the experience that they have had of the overruling providence of God and of the supporting power of the people upon whom they depended.

And now, O God, grant them wisdom, we pray Thee, to enter upon the discharge of these new responsibilities with added strength and courage. May they have increased faith in God; faith in the righteous cause; faith in the power of truth; faith in the intelligence and right-mindedness of the people, and so may they go forward to perfect the work which they have so nobly begun. Grant, we pray Thee, that with a true Christian and manly courage they may perform all things that are demanded by the welfare and best interest of the country. Everything that justice mingled with mercy requires, may they be ready to perform. May they leave nothing to be done by those who shall come after them that they of right ought to perform; and as the result of their deliberations and decisions we pray that there may be no spot in this land that is not wholly consecrated to freedom—Christian freedom. May there be no foot of our territory which shall not be free, so that every man, wherever the flag floats, or ought to be unfurled, shall be secure in life, liberty, and property. We pray Thee, O God, that the end of what they do may be, that every man shall be invested anew with every civil and every political right that belongs to a proper manhood; and may there be no flinching or faltering in any one question connected with these great issues.

O God, bless all those who have any influence upon the destinies of the land. May all the high officers of the Government, the President included, be taught of God Himself, influenced by the Holy Ghost, so that if it be possible there may be harmony in all the operations of every department of the Government. We ask not for harmony that is the result of any compromise, of any yielding, of the right. May those who are right be stronger than ever in the right; and may peace be procured by the yielding of those who are wrong.

Will God bless the Senate of the United States also. And now we pray Thy blessing on us individually in every relation of life, and when at last all is over may we be able to step off into that unknown—unknown except to faith—with a good hope in Jesus Christ; and we will give all the praise and the glory now and forever unto the triune God. Amen.

The SPEAKER stated that one hundred and forty-six members (more than a quorum) had answered to their names, and that the House was ready to proceed to the transaction of business.

QUALIFICATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of privilege, and present the credentials of Messrs. WILLIAM B. CAMPBELL, SAMUEL M. ARNELL, and ISAAC R. HAWKINS, members-elect from the fifth, sixth, and seventh districts, respectively, of the State of Tennessee. Those gentlemen are now in attendance, ready to take the oath of office.

Mr. DAWES. The credentials of the members from Tennessee were at the last session referred to the Committee of Elections. I move that the credentials now presented be so referred, before the gentlemen are sworn in as members.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Elections at the last session reported in favor of the admission of eight members from the State of Tennessee; and that report was accepted by the House. These are three gentlemen who, being absent, were not sworn in at that time. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] desire that their credentials shall be again referred?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir. The fact just mentioned had slipped my memory. I withdraw my motion.

Messrs. CAMPBELL, ARNELL, and HAWKINS appeared, and were duly qualified by taking the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and laws.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of privilege, and present the credentials of Mr. ELIJAH HISE, a member-elect from the third district of Kentucky, lately represented by Hon. Henry Grider, now deceased, and also the credentials of ANDREW H. WARD, member-elect from the sixth district of the same State, lately represented by Hon. Green Clay Smith, resigned.

Messrs. HISE and WARD appeared, and were duly qualified by taking the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and laws.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a quorum having answered to their names I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Clerk inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States to inform him a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The resolutions were adopted.

The SPEAKER appointed as such committee, Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. FINCK.

NEWS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask now that the Speaker may assign to the United States and European News Association a seat for its reporter upon the floor of the House, at some point where it will be of no inconvenience to the members.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know whether the motion just made embraces the editor of the London Times, who is now in town and ought to be invited to take a seat upon the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My motion only applies to a permanent agent of the Associated Press. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can make his own motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I merely made the inquiry.

CALL OF STATES FOR RESOLUTIONS.

The first business in order was a call of the States for resolutions.

COMMITTEE ON FREEDMEN.

Mr. ELIOT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That a standing committee, called the Committee on Freedmen, consisting of nine members, be appointed by the Speaker at the beginning of each session of Congress, which committee shall have charge of all matters concerning freedmen which shall be committed to it by the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by its Secretary, Mr. JOHN W. FORNEY, informing the House that a quorum of the Senate had assembled and was now ready to proceed to business; and further, that it had appointed Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. NESMITH a committee, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House, to wait upon the President and to inform him a quorum of each House had assembled and Congress was ready to receive any communication he may please to make.

PRESIDENT'S PARDONING POWER.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to repeal the thirteenth section of an act entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, and seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask for the reading of the section proposed to be repealed.

The Clerk read as follows:

"SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

Mr. FINCK. I object.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 116, nays 28, not voting 45; as follows:

SALE OF GOLD.

Mr. BOUTWELL introduced a bill to provide for the sale of gold, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the sum of $2,000,000 in gold in the city of New York, on each and every Monday, in lots not exceeding $10,000 each, whenever the amount of gold in the Treasury shall exceed $42,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. SPALDING's motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL's motion was then agreed to.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SCHENCK introduced a bill to fix the time for the regular meeting of Congress; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not desire action on the bill at the present time. I now move that it be made the special order for Tuesday, the 11th instant, after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think there is already a special order for that day. If this bill shall come in after the special orders that have already been fixed for that day, I will have no objection.

The SPEAKER. There are several postponements of special orders from the last session. They will take precedence in the order of their dates.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will modify my motion. I move that the bill be postponed and made the special order for Thursday next, after the morning hour, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to suspend the rules in order to enable me to introduce and have referred a bill to create and organize a Department to be called the Department of Internal Revenue.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the reading of the bill at length.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, but before concluding,

Mr. HALE said: I move to suspend the rule under which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] has the right to call for the reading of this bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the Chair if the reading of a bill can be interrupted in this way?

The SPEAKER. It can. Any member has the right under the rules to call for the reading of a bill. And under the same rules any member has the right to move to suspend the rules that gives the right to call for the reading. The Chair will state that the rule is that motions to suspend the rules can be made on each Monday only, after the expiration of one hour succeeding the reading of the Journal. There being no Journal read to-day that rule does not apply to this day.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. HALE, and upon a division there were—ayes one hundred and eight, noes not counted.

So (two thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the further reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. KELLEY to suspend the rules in order to enable him to introduce a bill, and being taken it was agreed to, two thirds voting in the affirmative.

So the rules were suspended, and the bill was introduced and read a first and second time.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend that motion, so that the bill may be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. GARFIELD; and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 62.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. KELLEY was then agreed to.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended in order to enable me to introduce a bill to regulate removals from office.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the reading of the bill at length.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that in all instances of appointments to office by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the power of removal shall be exercised only in concurrence with the Senate.

The second section provides that in case of disability or misconduct in office, occurring during the recess of the Senate, where the interests of the public may make it necessary to displace the incumbent until the advice and consent of the Senate can be duly had and obtained thereon, it shall be lawful for the President to suspend the disabled or defaulting officer, and to designate some other person to perform the duties of the office until the Senate shall have the opportunity of acting thereupon. And it shall be the duty of the President, within ten days after the next meeting of the Senate, to report to it the fact of such suspension, with the reasons therefor, and to nominate a person for the place, and in case of the refusal of the Senate to concur in such suspension, either by a direct vote thereon, or by advising and consenting to the appointment of the person so nominated, the officer suspended shall thereupon resume the exercise of his official functions as though the same had not been suspended.

The third section provides that every person who has been or shall hereafter be nominated to the Senate for office, and who shall fail to receive the advice and consent of the Senate thereto, shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States for the term of three years after such rejection, unless two thirds of the Senate shall relieve him of such disability. And whenever any person has assumed office, and discharged its duties upon the nomination of the President, before he has been confirmed by the Senate, or his rejection by the Senate, all subordinates and deputies appointed by him, or on his recommendation, shall vacate their places.

The fourth section provides that all nominations made by the President shall be communicated to the Senate within twenty days after they are made, or after the commencement of the next succeeding session of the Senate.

The question was upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to state that I do not propose to ask for action upon this bill at this time, but shall move that its further consideration be postponed until Friday next, and that it be made the special order for that day after the morning hour.

Mr. SPALDING. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] aware that that subject is now before the joint committee on retrenchment? They have the subject now before them and are considering it.

Mr. STEVENS. All I know is that I offer this bill. If the gentleman does not like it he can vote against it.

Mr. SPALDING. He will probably assume that privilege, whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] likes it or not.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; and the bill was postponed, and made a special order for Friday next, after the morning hour, and ordered to be printed.

MANAGEMENT OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING.

Mr. LAFLIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be requested to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the selection of a proper person to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office, for the execution of all the congressional and departmental printing.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. BROOMALL introduced a bill regulating the appointment of certain public officers; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LE BLOND called for the reading of the bill at length; and it was read.

ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to make a privileged report. The joint committee of the two Houses, appointed to wait on the President and advise him of the organization of Congress, beg leave to report that they have discharged that duty, and that the President has informed them that he will communicate his message to Congress at once.

EXEMPTION FROM INCOME TAX.

Mr. ANCONA submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to take into consideration and report at the earliest day practicable a bill providing an adjustment of the rates and amount of exemption from the income tax, in accordance with the pledges made to the people by Congress at the last session, when action was last taken upon the general subject of internal revenue duties.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that this resolution in its present form will not be adopted, although I have no objection to a reference of the subject to the committee.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. ANCONA. I will move the reference of the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means. That will accomplish the same purpose.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

INSPECTORS OF DISTILLERIES.

Mr. MILLER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, requested to inquire into the expediency of so changing the revenue laws as to dispense with the present mode of appointing inspectors of distilleries of ardent spirits, and report by bill or otherwise.

MODIFICATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. KELLEY submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of immediately repealing the provisions of the internal revenue law whereby a tax of five per cent. is imposed on the products of the mechanical and manufacturing industry of the country.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the Clerk now proceed to read the President's message, of which I send a copy to the desk. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The message has not yet been officially communicated to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. The copy which I send up is that already issued in the official paper, the Constitutional Union, [laughter]—the paper published by Colonel Florence. Anything emanating from that source must, I presume, be authentic. [Renewed laughter.] However, I withdraw the motion.

APPOINTMENTS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. WARNER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire whether any appointments of postmasters have been made, or whether any postmasters now acting as such now hold the commissions or perform the duties of postmaster, in violation of section twenty-six of the act entitled "An act to change the organization of the Post Office and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof," passed July 2, 1838, with authority to report by bill or otherwise.

MEETING OF THE NEXT CONGRESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer for action at the present time a bill to fix the time for the meeting of the next Congress. It provides that after the expiration of the present session the next meeting of Congress shall be at noon on the first Monday of March next.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope it will be ordered to be printed and made the special order for Tuesday next with my own proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire action now, and demand the previous question.

Mr. FINCK. Has it been regularly introduced?

The SPEAKER. If when introduced objection had been made that notice had not been given of its introduction, it would not have been in order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope it will be referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. At the suggestion of several gentlemen, I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOHN GRAY.

Mr. BINGHAM introduced a bill for the relief of John Gray; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. SPALDING. I object, as proper notice has not been given.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were not suspended.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we had better adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The committee appointed to wait on the President has reported that he was ready to communicate with Congress to-day. The House refused to adjourn.

following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. SCHENCK introduced the following bill:

A bill to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, instead of any grant of land or other bounty, there shall be allowed and paid to each and every soldier, sailor, and marine who faithfully served as such in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps of the United States, and who has been, or who may hereafter be, honorably discharged from such service, the sum of eight and one third dollars per month, or at the rate of $100 per year, as hereinafter provided, for all the time during which such soldier, sailor, or marine actually so served, between the 12th day of April, 1861, and the 19th day of April, 1865. And in the case of any such soldier, sailor, or marine, discharged from the service on account of wounds received in battle, or while engaged in the line of his duty, the said allowance of bounty shall be computed and paid up to the end of the term of service for which his enlistment was made. And in case of the death of any such soldier, sailor, or marine, while in the service, or in case of his death after the discharge and before the end of his term of enlistment, if discharged on account of being wounded, as provided, the allowance and payment shall be made to his widow if she has not been remarried, or if there be no widow, then to the minor child or children of the deceased who may be under sixteen years of age.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in computing and ascertaining the bounty to be paid to any soldier, sailor, or marine, or his proper representatives, under the provisions of this act, there shall be deducted therefrom any and all bounties already paid, or payable under existing laws, by the United States, or by any State; county, city, town, or other municipal organization, or by any voluntary association, so that in no case shall the aggregate amount of bounty allowed and paid from all sources exceed eight and one third dollars for each month of actual faithful service, or at the rate of $100 per year. And in the case of any sailor or marine to whom prize money has been paid, or is payable, the amount of such prize money shall also be deducted, and only such amount of bounty paid as shall, together with such prize money and any other bounty paid or payable by the United States, or by any State, county, city, town, or other municipal organization, or by any voluntary association, amount in the aggregate to the sum allowed by this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no bounty, under the provisions of this act, shall be paid to or on account of any soldier, sailor, or marine who served as a substitute in either the Army or Navy, or who was a captured prisoner of war at the time of his enlistment, nor to any one who was discharged on his own application or request, prior to the 9th day of April, 1865, unless such discharge was obtained with a view to reenlistment, or to accept promotion in the military or naval service of the United States, or to be transferred from one branch of the military service to another, and such person did actually so reenlist or accept promotion or was so transferred. And no bounty shall be paid to any soldier, sailor, or marine, discharged on the application or at the request of parents, guardians, or other persons, or on the ground of minority.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every petition or application for bounty made under the provisions of this act shall disclose and state specifically under oath, and under the pains and penalties of perjury, what amount of bounty, either from the United States or from any other source, and what amount of prize money, if any, has been paid or is payable to the soldier, sailor, or marine, by whom or by whose representatives the claim is made.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever application shall be made by any claimant, through any attorney or agent, the post office address of the claimant shall be furnished, giving the name of the county and State in which it is situated, and the amount of commission or fee which the attorney or agent is to receive for his service in the settlement of the claim, which charges in no case shall exceed the sum of five dollars; and every such application shall be accompanied by the written affidavit of the attorney or agent, that he has not charged, nor agreed for, and will not accept more than such sum of five dollars for his services in the case. The Paymaster General, or proper accounting officer of the Treasury, upon ascertaining the amount due, shall cause to be transmitted to such claimant the full amount thereof, less the fee to be paid to the attorney or agent, which fee shall be paid to the said attorney or agent in person, or transmitted to such address as the attorney may direct.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That any attorney or agent who shall receive from any claimant a sum greater than five dollars for the prosecution of any claim under the provisions of this act, upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine not to exceed the sum of $1,000, or imprisonment for a term not less than one year, or both, as the court or jury may adjudge, and shall be forever thereafter excluded from prosecuting claims of any nature whatever against the Government of the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That in case the payments shall be made in the form of a check, order, or draft upon any paymaster, national bank, or Government depository in or near the district wherein the claimant may reside, it shall be necessary for the claimant to establish, by the affidavits of two credible witnesses, that he is the identical person named therein; but in no case shall such checks, orders, or drafts be made negotiable until after such identification.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any soldier, sailor, or marine to transfer, assign, barter, or sell his discharge, final statement, descriptive list, or other papers, for the purpose of transferring, assigning, bartering, or selling any interest in any bounty under the provisions of this act; and all such transfers, assignments, barters, or sales heretofore made are hereby declared null and void as to any rights intended so to be conveyed by any such soldier, sailor, or marine.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That no adjustment or payment of any claim of any soldier, sailor, or marine, or of his proper representatives, under the provisions of this act, shall be made unless the application be filed within two years from the passage of the act; and the settlement of accounts of deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines shall be made in the same manner as now provided by law.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That sections twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen of an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, approved July 28, 1866, are hereby repealed. But if any money shall have been paid to any person under the provisions of said sections repealed, the amount thereof shall be deducted in each case by the proper accounting officer from any sum to be allowed under this act. And any application made for allowance of bounty under the said act of July 28, 1866, with all the evidence and papers submitted therewith, shall be taken and considered as filed under the requirements of this act, and shall be used hereunder for the benefit of the applicant as far as the same may be applicable.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

G. E. PICKETT.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to communicate to this House, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, the information asked for in a resolution of this House dated the 23d June last, and which resolution he has up to this time failed to answer, as to whether any application has been made to him for the pardon of G. E. Pickett, who acted as a major general of the rebel forces in the late war for the suppression of insurrection, and if so, what has been the action thereon; and also to communicate copies of all papers, entries, indorsements, and other documentary evidence in relation to any proceeding in connection with such application; and that he also inform this House whether, since the adjournment at Raleigh, North Carolina, on the 30th of March last, of the last board or court of inquiry, convened to investigate the facts attending the hanging of a number of United States soldiers for alleged desertion from the rebel army, any further measures have been taken to bring the said Pickett or other perpetrators of that crime to punishment.

Mr. BANKS. I hope it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have no doubt the information will be sent with the President's message.

The motion was disagreed to.

The Clerk then read the President's annual message. [The message will be published in the Appendix.]

During the reading of the message,

Mr. STEVENS said: We all of us have a copy of this message, and our friends who gave us notice are waiting for our reception. Now, it will take three quarters of an hour longer to read the message, and I move the further reading be postponed till to-morrow.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 60, noes 50.

Resolved, That the message, with the reports of the Secretaries of the several Departments and the papers relating to Mexican affairs, be printed for the use of the House, in forms separate from the general documents accompanying the message.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the gentleman had better refer that to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BANKS. We want a certain number of these printed separately.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. But we certainly want them to go with the general documents.

Mr. BANKS. If the House adopts this order, the report of the Secretary of State and the correspondence relative to Mexican affairs will be on our tables to-morrow; if not, we may have to wait for it for some time. Extra copies can be ordered, if desirable.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING.

Mr. CRESWELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what amount of money has been paid or ordered to be paid since the 18th day of May last to the several newspapers printed and published in the District of Columbia for advertising notices and proposals for each of the Executive Departments of the Government; and that he further inform the Senate of the number and character of the advertisements for which said money was paid, and the name of every officer of the Government who approved each of the bills for said advertisements or directed the same to be paid; and also that he inform the Senate when, and in what manner, the extent of the circulation of the daily newspapers printed in the city of Washington or elsewhere in the District of Columbia was determined, and that he furnish copies of the sworn statements of the publishers of said newspapers in support of their claim to have the largest circulation.

FRENCH TROOPS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up the resolution that I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence or other information in his possession in regard to the following points:

1. Whether the French Emperor has complied with his announcement toward the United States to withdraw one third of the French troops in Mexico during the month of November last.

2. Whether any number of said French troops has been withdrawn in accordance with that announcement.

3. Whether, if, as it appears, no troops have been withdrawn, the French Emperor has offered any explanation or apology for his course, or whether he has proposed a different understanding by which the withdrawal will be delayed.

4. What action, if any, the Government has taken to see that understanding carried out.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I doubt whether it is expedient to proceed to the consideration of that resolution now. It seems to me, all things considered, that it would be advisable to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It touches a very important question; and the Senate, even in listening to it, as they have now that it has been read from the desk, must be struck by some of the language that is employed. I do not presume now to criticize it; I do not know that the language may not be proper; but I have my doubts; and under the circumstances it seems to me that the resolution had better lie on the table until our committees are formed, and that the resolution should then be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a motion?

Mr. SUMNER. Under the circumstances I think it not advisable to take up the resolution. If it should be taken up, I should feel bound to move that it lie on the table until the formation of the committees, so that it might be properly considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the resolution will be taken up. It is a mere resolution of inquiry on a subject of deep interest to the country. There is nothing in it, I think, to which exception can be taken. I hope the resolution will be taken up and acted upon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senate of the United States will not adopt a resolution couched in such language. I know the honorable mover did not mean to use language that one Government ought not to present to another; but on inspection it will be found that the words he uses are such as one Government ought not to use to another; for instance, it inquires whether the Emperor of the French has offered an apology. I am satisfied that I have made my objection sufficiently to the Senate without offering another word. There is language in that resolution that I cannot vote for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has just been read?

Mr. SUMNER. I say again that I hope at this day the Senate will not proceed with its consideration. I have no desire to avoid a discussion of the topics in that resolution on any proper occasion. The Senate is aware that the President at some length has stated what he has done on the matters referred to in that resolution; in short, to a certain extent he has anticipated that resolution, and he has announced to us that he will communicate or has communicated the correspondence on the subject. Under those circumstances I do not think it advisable that we should to-day adopt a resolution the language of which, I think, has not been carefully considered; and under the circumstances I think it advisable that it should pass under the eye of a committee of this body.

The motion to take up the resolution was not agreed to.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 828.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. "A bill to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862."

Mr. SUMNER. Let the bill be read, so that we may see what is in it.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the thirteenth section of an act entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have that thirteenth section read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the section referred to in the bill is asked for. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SEC. 13 And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have some doubts whether it was necessary in the first instance for Congress to pass the section which it is now proposed to repeal. The power of pardon is given by the Constitution to the Executive; and the only necessity for the original act now sought to be repealed was a doubt, I suppose, whether under that power the President of the United States could pardon all, in the form of a general amnesty. I am not prepared to say whether he could or could not do it; but it is a question that is certainly open for deliberation. If he could do it under the Constitution as it is, the original act was wholly unnecessary; but if he could not do it under the Constitution, without the authority of Congress, in the form in which Congress authorized him to do it, by a declaration of general amnesty, he could certainly issue a pardon to every one of the parties who might stand in a situation requiring to be pardoned. Over that power of course Congress has no control. Practically, the question is of little or no moment, I suppose; for the President has issued no general amnesty. The amnesty which he has issued is less extensive than that which was issued by his predecessor. But, at any rate, under the circumstances, I submit to the Senate, as there is no occasion now for prompt action, whether it is not advisable that this bill, relating to a very important question of constitutional power, should go to some committee, either the Judiciary Committee, if the Senate should think that proper, or some other committee selected by the Senate. I hope that, instead of being acted on now, it will take that course; and if nobody else makes the motion, I move, as the committees are not yet appointed, that the bill lie on the table to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary when that committee shall have been appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the bill has not yet been taken up. The motion is that the Senate now proceed to its consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. If it be taken up I shall make the motion which I have indicated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know, sir, that I shall not be in favor of passing this bill as it stands; but it is unnecessary that I should say anything on that subject at the present time. My conviction is, and has been for some time, that no bill ought to be allowed to pass the Senate without having previously been examined and considered by a committee of the body. It is true that of late years, since the war commenced, we have been in the habit of doing things with some considerable rapidity, and on several occasions have passed bills without sending them to a committee. There may be occasions when it is admissible to do so, when time is pressing, and it is important to do the thing desired and it may be readily and easily understood. But, sir, I need not remind the Senate that on several occasions when we have passed bills with the idea that we understood them perfectly, we have found afterward that we have got ourselves into difficulty and had been so unfortunate as to act very unadvisedly and very injuriously. No particular instance now occurs to me; but the fact is impressed on my mind that there have been instances of that kind, and gentlemen will undoubtedly recollect them.

Now, sir, if I saw a necessity for immediate action on this matter, a pressing necessity for prompt action, I should be willing to take up the bill for consideration at once. It is suggested aside that the matter is pressing because the President may do several things under the act of 1862 which the repeal of the law would prevent his doing. Suppose it to be so; the President has ten days to consider every bill that is submitted to him, and if this bill should be passed by the Senate, and he is disposed to act in the way suggested, he has ten days within which he might do whatever he might choose to do before the bill was either approved by him or disapproved and returned so that it could be acted on by Congress. Then I do not see any advantage that is to be gained by immediate action and by breaking over a rule which is a most valuable one, and which I shall hereafter on all occasions, except those which are very pressing, insist upon, that every bill which is brought in for our consideration should be first submitted to the scrutiny and examination of a committee. That is my view in regard to it, and with that view I shall vote against taking up the bill at the present time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, this bill was passed by the House of Representatives yesterday, I understand, and it has not been referred to a committee of the Senate. It is to be supposed that the House of Representatives saw some reason satisfactory to them for speedy action on this subject. There can be no doubt that the general power of pardon, of pardoning offenses, is granted in its plenitude by the Constitution of the United States to the President, and no act such as that from which an extract has been read is necessary to be passed by Congress in order to confer on the President the power of pardon. I do not suppose, sir, that the necessity for repealing the thirteenth section of the confiscation act of 1862 arises from the mere fact that the President of the United States has the power of pardon and may exercise it. I take it for granted that there is some other evil, either existing or apprehended, which has led to the speedy enactment by the House of Representatives of the bill now before us. I take it for granted, sir, that the great object of this bill is, if possible, to prevent an unwise restoration of property to persons who have heretofore been engaged in the rebellion, by the President of the United States, under the confiscation act of 1862; and if I have been rightly informed there is a necessity for the speedy action of Congress upon this subject.

I do not understand that the power of restoring forfeited property to offenders under the confiscation act is a power legitimately included in the constitutional power of pardoning offenses. It seems to me to be a distinct and separate function conferred on the President by the confiscation act; and I have great fear myself that proceedings have been had under the confiscation act in the way of restoring forfeited property to rebels with which the country will not be very generally satisfied when they come to understand all the facts of the case. I suppose that the bill now before us is intended to foreclose and put an end to this restoration of rebel property by the President of the United States, so far as it is practicable for us to do so; and for one I hope the bill will be taken up and acted upon speedily, without unnecessary delay; and I see no necessity for referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary or to any other committee of this body. We all know quite well what the thirteenth section of the confiscation act of 1862 is. The object of this present bill is simple, and aims only to the repeal of that thirteenth section. The repeal of that section, I take it, will, for the future, prevent the President of the United States from attempting to restore to its former owners property which has become confiscated on account of those owners having been engaged in the rebellion.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I think if there ever was a case when the prompt action of Congress was needed, it is this. It is alleged that hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property confiscated under the law have under that section been restored by the President. The country expects us to act promptly in this case. It is alleged that pardons are for sale for money around the streets of this town by women of at least doubtful reputation, and with those pardons property has been restored to the amount of millions. Sir, if there ever was an occasion that required prompt action, in my judgment that occasion is now, and this bill is that occasion. If the President has powers under the Constitution, let him exercise them; but in God's name give him no greater power than he possesses under the Constitution, to exercise as they have been exercised for the last twelve months. I hope that the Senate will take up this bill and pass it as promptly as the House of Representatives did. The House suspended the rules and passed it within the hour, and the country looks to the Senate to act with as much promptness as the House. I hope, sir, there will be no delay, and no reference of this bill. I hope it will be passed this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I was not very well satisfied with the confiscation bill when we passed it, as I suppose every Senator who was here at that time very well knows, and I think that the power granted by the clause which it is now proposed to repeal has been very grossly abused; but I am not aware of any confiscated property that is now about to be restored. The report of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, made at the last session of Congress, shows that lands of rebels which had been taken possession of as confiscated property were subsequently, by order of the President, restored to their previous owners; but I do not know that at this time there is any property likely to be restored under this clause of the confiscation act.

It is very probable that I shall vote for this bill repealing the clause under consideration; but I think there is very great force in the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine, that it is always safer to refer a bill to some one of our committees. The committees are not yet formed. There is now no committee to which this bill can be referred. I know of no pressing necessity for the passage of the bill to-day. I will not commit myself to say that it ought to pass at all. I should like to be better informed than I am to-day before voting upon it. My impressions certainly are in its favor; but I think we had better act deliberately and understandingly, and not under excitement, as if we had come together and were in a great hurry to repeal this statute which we ourselves passed only three or four years ago. I trust that the measure will not be forced to a vote at the present time; I trust that the Senate will not take it up for consideration now. I know of nothing to be gained by that course. I think it is a bad practice; and unless some Senator will show that there is danger of property being restored, that there is some pressing necessity for action to-day, I trust the motion will not be pressed, or if it is pressed before the Senate, that we shall not proceed to the consideration of the bill. If reasons were given showing that this power is to be abused between to-day and to-morrow or next day, I would not object to considering the bill at once, but knowing no reason and none having been stated, I think we had better let the bill take the ordinary course.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if the yeas and nays had not been called for upon this motion, of course I should have said nothing about it; and even then I do not know that I should have said a word but for an expression which has just been dropped by the Senator from Illinois. I propose to vote for the motion; but I should be unwilling that any one should infer from that vote that I was acting under any undue excitement. I do not think any such inference would properly arise. It seems to me that there is the best of all reasons patent upon the face of the Journal for proceeding to the consideration of this bill. That is what I understand to be the motion: it is not a motion that the bill pass immediately, but that we proceed to the consideration of it now. That very good reason of which I spoke, it seems to me, arises from the fact that the bill is pending here, and I do not know that we have anything else to do. I do not know of any better opportunity to proceed to the consideration of it.

There is another reason which it seems to me supports the motion very strongly, and that is that nobody seems to have any sort of objection to this bill. I understand the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Maine both to say that they are not satisfied with the powers granted in the section of the act of 1862 which it is proposed by this bill to repeal. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that he believes the powers granted there are not only unjust in themselves, but that they have been abused. I did not know myself that they had been abused, but I do not think they are powers which we should vest in any one, and I do not think there is any occasion for our assenting to them any longer. If we had other and more important business to attend to now that would be a reason for postponing the consideration of this bill; but as I know of nothing else, I shall vote to proceed to its consideration.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cresswell, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Cragin, Guthrie, McDougall, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Sprague, and Yates—10.

So the motion of Mr. CHANDLER was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

Mr. HUNTER appeared and qualified by taking the prescribed oath.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the regular order of business.

COMMITTEE ON FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. ELIOT, reported back the following as an additional rule, upon the adoption of which he demanded the previous question:

There shall be appointed, at the commencement of every Congress, a standing Committee on Freedmen, to consist of nine members, whose duty it shall be to take charge of all matters concerning freedmen which shall be referred to them by the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I modify the resolution so as to call the committee the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, instead of the Committee on Freedmen.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL FRY.

Mr. ECKLEY, by unanimous consent, withdrew the following preamble and resolution offered on the 23d of July, 1866:

Whereas, on the 30th of April, a letter, purporting to be written by General Fry, was read in this House, together with sundry documents accompanying it, which letter was grossly libelous, and reflected upon the public and private character of a member; and whereas the House having ordered an inquiry as to said letter and its truth or falsity; and whereas, for that purpose, a select committee was raised, which committee has ascertained and reported said letter to have been false and malicious; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire and report whether any breach of the privileges of the House not sufficiently reported upon by said select committee has been committed in connection with writing or sending said letter, the documents accompanying the same, or the introduction thereof into the House, or causing the same to be read in the House, or entered upon the record of the House, or making the same public; and if so, by whom, and what action, if any, should be taken; and that said committee also inquire and report whether the said libel has been republished or renewed by the said General Fry, or any other person since the termination of the session of said committee; and if so, by whom, and whether any or what action ought to be had thereon; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in reply to a resolution of the House of June 7, 1866, transmitting reports of the Quartermaster General, the Paymaster General, and the Commissary General, as to the amounts expended in suppressing Indian hostilities during the years 1864 and 1865; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON THE CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the Comptroller of the Currency; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and the Currency, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER stated as the regular order of business, the consideration, as a special order, of bill of the House No. 771, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, and for other purposes."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency. There was a good deal of discussion on this bill at the last session, and recommendations have since been made by the Treasury Department and by the Currency Bureau which will affect the bill. I therefore move that the bill be recommitted, and on that motion I ask the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order for me to say a few words in dissent of that proposition?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] to withdraw his call for the previous question, with the understanding that I will renew it in after I have stated to the House my reasons opposition to the motion to recommit this bill.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I will withdraw the call for the previous question with that understanding.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this bill occupied the attention of the Committee on Banking and Currency during nearly six months of the last session of Congress. I fear that if it is recommitted now it will not receive, during this short session, that consideration which its present status upon the files of the House will be likely to secure it. I think we are as competent to consider in the House the recommendations made by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report in connection with this bill as the Committee on Banking and Currency will be.

Therefore fearing that the reforms which the bill, as reported at the last session, would accomplish in the banking system of the country may not be enacted into a law if it is now recommitted, I trust the House will not adopt the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If the gentleman is not ready to proceed with the consideration of the bill at this time, let it be postponed to some definite day, a week or ten days hence, when the subject can have full and fair consideration. I hope, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts will not prevail, but that the House will postpone the subject to some future day. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. In order, if possible, to meet the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I will modify my motion by adding to it that the committee have leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent, as the rules cannot be suspended on this day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the bill be read that we may know what it is.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Why should the time of the House be taken up by reading this bill? It is a very long one, covering some twenty printed pages.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the bill, but before concluding,

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to dispense with the further reading.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, but before concluding,

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, said: I ask that by unanimous consent the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, in order that I may move that the bill be postponed until the third Tuesday of December, and made the special order for that day after the morning hour. Upon consultation with several of my colleagues upon the Committee on Banking and Currency, I find that such a disposition of the subject will be satisfactory.

No objection was made; and the further reading of the bill was accordingly dispensed with.

The bill was then postponed until Tuesday, the 18th instant, and made the special order for that day after the morning hour.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. The first business in order is the calling of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Commerce, where the call rested on yesterday.

PENNSYLVANIA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House bill No. 65, to create the northern judicial district of Pennsylvania, and moved that the same be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House bill No. 576, to authorize the employment of additional counsel in cases of claims depending against the Government of the United States, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF REAL ESTATE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House joint resolution No. 12, to repeal a portion of the joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, and moved that the same be laid upon the table.

The bill was laid upon the table, and the report accompanying it was ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, a bill (H. R. No. 560) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof.'"

The SPEAKER. As this bill comes up for consideration now, it will be reported at length.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] that it is unnecessary to have this bill read now. Let it be postponed till some early day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I move that the bill be postponed until Thursday of next week, after the morning hour, be made a special order for that time, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move that the bill be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JENCKES, from the select committee on the civil service of the United States, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 678) entitled "An act to regulate the civil service of the United States, and to promote the efficiency thereof;" which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. JENCKES, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

CALL OF STATES.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States and Territories, in inverse order, for the introduction of resolutions and of bills on leave.

SOLDIERS' BOUNTIES—PAY OF MEMBERS.

Mr. COBB submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas sections twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen of the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, approved July 28, 1866, which sections of said act provide for the payment of an additional bounty to certain soldiers of the Union Army, were prepared and passed in great haste, and without due examination or consideration by the members of either House of Congress, by reason of which the said sections are believed to but illy express the will of Congress, are partial in their application, and fall far short of an equalization of bounties; and whereas sections seventeen and eighteen of said act, providing for an increase of the pay of members of Congress, were attached to said bill and adopted in great haste in the closing hours of the session, receiving but a bare majority of votes in a very thin House, and being believed to be of questionable propriety as well in substance as in form: Therefore,

Resolved, First, that the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending said act as to provide for the payment of an additional bounty to all soldiers of the late volunteer forces of the United States who served faithfully in the late war, have been honorably discharged, and have not received nor are entitled to receive more than $100 bounty under previous laws; also of amending said act so that the soldier shall not be deprived of its benefits by reason of the accidental loss or destruction of his certificate of honorableness discharge without fault on his part, and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, Second, that the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of said act as provides for an increase of the pay of members of Congress, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DESERTIONS OF DRAFTED MEN.

Mr. PAINE submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the names of all persons who, having been duly enrolled and drafted into the military and naval service of the United States, failed to report to the proper authorities under such draft, showing the districts and sub-districts in which they were severally enrolled and drafted; also, the names of all persons who, under the provisions of the twenty-first section of the act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1865, forfeited their rights of citizenship and their right to become citizens, and became forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any right of citizens thereof, by desertion from the military or naval service, showing the residence, and the company and regiment or ship of each deserter.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

Mr. ANCONA. I object to its consideration now. Let it lie over.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to its consideration, the resolution lies over under the rule.

INTERNAL TAXATION.

Mr. PRICE introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxation," &c., approved July 13, 1866; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MICHIGAN HARBORS.

Mr. FERRY submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for such harbors on the western coast of the State of Michigan as have been surveyed by the General Government the current year, upon official report and estimates by the engineer department of the amounts requisite for the same, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to inform this House, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, how near "the verge of the Government the present body called a Congress" is at present; and if it is not nearer the center than he formerly supposed.

[Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes twenty.

Mr. LE BLOND called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was then rejected.

RESPONSE TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WENTWORTH submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, In response to that portion of the President's message which relates to those communities that claimed to be the confederate States of America, that this House find in the many acts of disloyalty that have transpired in those communities since its last adjournment, as well as in the recent elections in the loyal States, additional reasons for insisting on the adoption of the pending constitutional amendment before it will consider the propriety of giving them congressional representation.

olution will probably come up to-morrow or the day after.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

Mr. MYERS. I offer the following preamble and resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Whereas, under the Constitution of the United States, the President of the United States has power to appoint officers of the United States, whose appointments are established by law, only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except temporarily to fill up vacancies that may happen in the recess of the Senate; and whereas the present Chief Magistrate, it is alleged, has, in numerous instances, failed to nominate such officers to the Senate for such advice and consent until its session had nearly closed, and then after rejection, reappointed them or designated others for their places, thus virtually exercising the sole power of appointment; and whereas in numerous other instances he has, it is alleged, appointed men to office and allowed a session of the Senate to elapse without sending in their names for confirmation; and whereas he has also, it is alleged, in numerous instances, during the recess of the Senate, made appointments to office where no vacancies had happened or existed:

Be it resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House at as early a day as possible,

1. The names of all persons reappointed by him after rejection by the Senate, or the names of others appointed in their stead with a designation of the offices to which they were so appointed and the dates of their several appointments, and of their nominations to the Senate.

2. A like list and designation of all persons appointed by him whose names were withheld from the Senate during its sessions.

3. A like list and designation of all appointments made by him during the recess of the Senate where no vacancy had happened, and if to fill vacancies, then a complete statement of how such vacancies occurred.

Mr. BOYER. I object to the introduction of that resolution at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] has a right to introduce the resolution under the call of States.

Mr. ANCONA. Is it not a call for executive information?

The SPEAKER. It is; and if any gentleman objects to its consideration now, it must lie over under the rule.

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution lies over under the rule.

Whereas it is publicly alleged that great frauds are daily practiced in the payment and collection of the internal revenue on distilled spirits, tobacco, and cigars, involving the integrity and fidelity of the revenue officers of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to investigate and report to this House the facts as to any frauds or evasions in the payment of internal duties, and as to the terms of compromise or settlement in any cases of underpayment or alleged fraud of any parties concerned in the manufacture of distilled spirits, tobacco, or cigars, and of any inspector or other internal revenue officer who may have had any connection, official or otherwise, therewith, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, introduced a bill conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims in certain cases; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to hear that bill read at length.

The bill was read at length. It confers upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine all claims against the United States arising under the grant of land reservations by the eighth article of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, of January 8, 1817, and the second section of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, of February 27, 1819; and that so much of the ninth and tenth sections of an act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States, approved February 24, 1855," as is inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire, what is the object of this bill?

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I have introduced the bill at this time merely for the purpose of having it referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I have no objection. The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. The call of States for resolutions and bills on leave having been concluded, the next business in order is the consideration of a resolution calling for executive information, offered on yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKEE], and laid over one day under the rule.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence or other information in the possession of the Government relative to the present condition of affairs in our sister republic of Mexico, and specially any letters of the minister at Washington from said republic, and the French minister, relating thereto.

Mr. McKEE. I call for the previous question upon agreeing to the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

The next business in order is the consideration of Senate bill No. 133, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the waters of the bay of San Francisco to Humboldt bay, in the State of California, which, at the last session, was postponed till to-day after the morning hour.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move the further consideration of this bill be postponed till two weeks from to-day, after the morning hour, and that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to this bill being made a special order; I have no objection to the postponement indicated.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will withdraw that part of my motion which proposes to make this bill a special order. I move that its further consideration be postponed till Tuesday, the 18th instant, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask consent of the House to make a statement in regard to a matter which has a personal reference to myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] making a personal explanation?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have observed in some of the newspapers what purported to be a report of some remarks made by me in a caucus of the Union members of the House on last Saturday evening. The report to which I refer is in many particulars quite incorrect. What I said was said very coolly; and I will repeat it substantially to the House.

I gave notice in the caucus that it was my purpose to introduce in this House at an early time a resolution calling for the correspondence between the State Department and our minister at Rome in reference to John H. Surratt; and I expressed a desire that my friends should support the passage of the resolution, if there should be any opposition to it. I then said—and I spoke just as coolly as I am speaking now—that I had good reason to believe that the executive department had had knowledge for many months of the place where Surratt was; that he was serving in the army of the Pope of Rome; that the department had for many months known the regiment and company in which and the name under which he was serving; and that they had observed a report of his arrest and escape; and I remarked that I thought, under all the circumstances, it was right that the country should know whether these were the facts or not. Therefore I desired that the resolution which I announced my intention to introduce, and which I did introduce yesterday, should be supported by the Union members of the House.

Now, sir, I will say that I have good reason—the very best of reasons, I believe—for thinking that as early as May last the executive department of this Government had knowledge where Surratt was. I did not say on last Saturday night, nor do I say now, nor have I said anywhere, that the Government has been at fault in not procuring his arrest; but when I left this city in July last I did expect that very soon the country would have knowledge that the arrest had been made. When week after week had passed away, and month after month elapsed, and there was no public information that the arrest of Surratt had been made, I did say in public speeches that I had good reason to believe that the Government had knowledge of his whereabouts.

I have this to say further: when the correspondence which has been called for shall appear, the House and the country will see whether the executive department had that knowledge or not. The House and the country will also see whether the Government has taken such measures as were in its power to secure Surratt's early arrest. Upon that point I have no knowledge whatever. Now, sir, if it shall appear that I have been mistaken as to the fact that the Government had such knowledge as I have stated, there is no person in this House or in the country who would be more willing to make the proper retraction than I will be.

I will say further, although it is a little aside from the matter with reference to Surratt, that while I am opposed to the President of the United States and his policy, I shall make no warfare upon him that I do not consider fair and legitimate. I shall not attempt, here or elsewhere, to misrepresent or abuse him; but what I do mean to undertake, and to perform to the extent of my ability, is to ascertain whether he has been true in the great office that he holds. I intend, as one member of this House, to bring to that inquiry a judicial mind. If it shall appear that he has been true, there is no citizen of this country who will recognize the fact more readily than myself. If, on the other hand, it shall prove otherwise, then, as a citizen and as a Representative, I shall perform my duty to the country.

NATIONAL ASYLUM FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to appoint two managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill certain vacancies; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire that this resolution may be considered at the present time, as it is a matter of immediate importance.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that Erastus E. Wolcott, of the State of Wisconsin, be appointed a manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of George H. Walker, of the third class of managers, for the term which expires on the 21st day of April, 1868; and that John S. Cavender, of the State of Missouri, be appointed a manager, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of P. Joseph Osterhaus, of the second class of managers, for the term which expires on the 21st day of April, 1870.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MUSTER-OUT ROLLS.

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, instructed to furnish, on the application of the adjutant general of any State, certified copies of the muster-out rolls of any organization of volunteers from said State serving in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, on the representation of said adjutant general that such muster-out rolls have not been returned by United States mustering officers to his department.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, (at five minutes to two o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of 65 citizens of the city of Cincinnati, who are engaged in manufacturing cigars, praying for a uniform tax on cigars.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 5, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WADE. I move that that bill lie on the table for a moment until the committees are appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

The bill was subsequently taken up, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

TELEGRAPHIC REPORTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to provide seats on the floor of the Senate for the accommodation of one reporter for the New York Associated Press and one reporter for the United States and European News Association.

I will say a word in regard to this resolution. There were some complaints made at the last session of the reports of the proceedings of the Senate by the Associated Press. Since that time two associations have been formed, one reporting for the New York press, and one for the western press, and perhaps a portion of the New England papers. The gentlemen who report for these associations say that it is impossible for them to hear in the gallery the proceedings of the Senate, and that it is especially difficult for them to hear what is said by the Presiding Officer of the Senate. I think, myself, that this would be a wise disposition of the matter, to allow these two representatives of semi-official associations seats on the floor wherever it will be convenient for them and convenient for the Senate, and will probably enable them to make more accurate reports. If any Senator desires it, I have no objection to the resolution being referred, but I suppose it is a matter that every one is familiar with, and I therefore ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio objected to?

Mr. CONNESS. I hope no action will be taken at present upon this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asks the Senate if there is any objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to add a few words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will understand, then, that there is no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to offer an objection, desiring to add a few words.

Mr. SHERMAN, [to Mr. CONNESS.] It can be taken up and then put over after you have said your few words, if you desire.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well; let it lie over.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not understand me as objecting to his making any remarks.

Mr. CONNESS. I understood the objection rather to come from the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. No. I think there would be no objection to the consideration of the resolution; but if the Senator desires further time, I have no objection to its going over, being committed, or taking any other course which he deems best.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, decides no question about objections to the resolution. The Chair simply asked of the Senate if there were objections to the present consideration of the resolution. Hearing none, the Chair says there is no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I rise simply to say, that for one I have no objection to such an arrangement in the Senate as shall give what I have heretofore called a true reflex of the proceedings of this body to the country. That is my desire as a Senator here; but my experience in that respect demands that I should now say that before that is done, or in connection with doing it, the Senate should take care that when the privilege of seats on the floor of this body is to be conceded or given to reporters, they shall have it connected with such regulations or control by this body as shall secure true reports. It is true that it is inconvenient to the reporters in the Senate gallery, and that they cannot always distinguish clearly there what is said in the Senate; but I incline to think that a disposition foreign to the question of the capacity to understand the proceedings of the Senate has governed in the case of reporting. I prefer at present that the matter should lie over, and let the resolution go to the Committee on Printing when the committees shall have been organized.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to letting it lie on the table. I will call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution will be laid on the table, at the instance of the mover.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of the standing committees of the body.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent to suspend the rule which requires that the committees be elected by ballot.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the rule requiring the committees to be elected by ballot may be waived at the present time. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the rule will be considered waived.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer a list of nominations for the several committees,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution embodying the names of the gentlemen to compose the standing committees will now be read for the information of the Senate:

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, That the following be the standing committees of the Senate during the present session, namely:

On Foreign Relations—Messrs. Sumner, (chairman,) Harris, Wade, Fowler, Fogg, Johnson, and Doolittle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution as just read.

The resolution was adopted.

RESTORATION OF CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the joint committee on retrenchment be instructed to make inquiry as to the power of the President to restore property confiscated under the laws of the United States to its original owners, or, if such power exists, to what extent it can right-fully be exercised under existing laws; and also to make inquiry into the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to private claimants therefor, without judicial proceedings, property, or the proceeds of property, seized by the United States as captured or abandoned during or since the late rebellion, and report by bill or otherwise.

CHARLES CLARK.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to introduce a joint resolution for the relief of Charles Clark, marshal of the United States for the district of Maine. The resolution is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to allow, in the settlement and adjustment of Mr. Clark's accounts, for a sum of money that was burnt and destroyed in the safe in the marshal's office at Portland during the great fire there. I should like to call the attention particularly of the Committee on the Judiciary to it. I propose to refer it to that committee, as it relates to money connected with the judicial department of the Government. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) for the relief of Charles Clark, marshal of the United States for the district of Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move now to take from the table House bill No. 828, to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the bill will not be referred to that committee or any other. The bill is very simple indeed, and very brief. The section proposed to be repealed is in these words:

"Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

The repeal of that section simply takes away all power of amnesty and pardon from the President except what he possesses under the Constitution. The House of Representatives by the very decided vote of 111 to 89 suspended the rules and passed the bill in the first half hour of their session. If there is any member of this body who does not understand just what that thirteenth section means, I advise him to get a dictionary and attempt to comprehend it, after taking a small edition of Webster; that will be large enough. It simply takes from the President all power of amnesty and pardon except what the Constitution gives him. If he has the power of pardon before conviction, under the Constitution, it leaves it there. If he can only pardon after conviction, it leaves it there. It leaves the President with the powers that the Constitution gives him, no more and no less. The country understands this question, and I believe every member of the Senate understands it, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the reference.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not rise to take part in this discussion on the subject of the reference of this measure, although I concur in the views which were expressed yesterday by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] I simply rise to say that I suppose by some inadvertence, whoever reported the debate of yesterday, not for the Globe, but for one of the newspapers published in this city, has fallen evidently into a mistake and has stated that I took part in the discussion. I suppose the reporter mistook my colleague for Senator Howe, my colleague from Wisconsin, because I took no part in the discussion. It is but just to myself that I should say that I concur in the opinion which was expressed by the Senator from Illinois as to the propriety of referring so important a question as this to some committee of the body.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, as I understand this proposition, if compelled to vote to-day, I shall feel disposed to vote in favor of the passage of the bill. When it shall be reported back from the Judiciary Committee, with the sanction of that committee, I have no question that I shall vote for it; but I am not to be deterred by the threat of the call for the yeas and nays which the Senator from Michigan has given notice of from insisting upon a strict enforcement of the rules of the Senate, unless there shall be some more substantial reason given for overthrowing those rules than has yet been assigned. I should like to know why it is that it is necessary that we should in such hot haste pass this bill. Does the Senator or any gentleman suppose that it is going to have any more influence with the country at large because we, in a fit of temper, as they will judge, choose to pass this bill the first hour of the session, than if we shall detain it in the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary one day or two days, and have the authority and sanction and the weight of character which will be given to it by the action and recommendation of that committee? I apprehend not, sir.

As was said here yesterday by a Senator near me, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] we have upon several occasions, during the eight or nine years that I have been here, passed bills in hot haste without a reference to a committee, as it is proposed to pass this bill, and in almost every such instance we have found that we have perpetrated some wrong, some mistake, and were afterward compelled to take the back track. I do not know with what haste we passed the bill one section of which it is now proposed to repeal: I only know that we did pass it and that I voted for it. I am satisfied now that we ought not to have incorporated it into that bill; but I want to have the authority of the committee of this body whose business it is to investigate such subjects to ratify and confirm my present impression in regard to it. If it is feared that the President will issue a general proclamation of amnesty, let me ask, does this action deny him the power to do it? After we pass this bill by a unanimous vote, if the Senate should pass it by such a vote, he will have the power to retain it under the Constitution for ten days in his hands, and during those ten days I apprehend it would not be denied that he could issue his proclamation if he chose to do it.

Mr. President, I fear that the country will regard that this is rather an incitement to the President to do something of the kind, that it will be invoking the exercise of some such power on his part, rather than any very great display of wisdom and prudence and statesmanship on our part.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is a notorious fact, as notorious as the records of a court, that pardons have been for sale around this town, for sale by women, and more than one woman. The records of your court in the District of Columbia show this. Any Senator who desires that disgraceful business to go on of course desires that this clause shall remain; any Senator who desires to stop that disgraceful business, desires that the clause shall be instantly repealed. This is a matter of public record, a matter that every man knows who has read the newspapers, or examined the records of your courts, and I have it from one of the judges of the court of this District that such is the fact. No nation was ever so disgraced as this nation has been by this public sale of pardons, and that under the clause of the law which I have read to this body.

Of course the bill is in the hands of the Senate. If they desire to send it to a committee and delay the repeal of that clause, let them send it to a committee or let them lay it on the table, or let them refuse to vote at all upon it. I want to see it pass. I want this disgraceful business stopped, and stopped here and now.

I deny that I have any more excitement than I ought to have when such an outrage as this is being perpetrated under my eyes and under the eyes of every member of this body. I hope the Senate will not send it to any committee, but will pass it with the same promptitude that it was passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, yesterday I voted to take up this bill, but with a view when taken up of moving, unless some member of the committee himself should do so, to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. I know, of course, nothing about the facts referred to by the Senator from Michigan; nor do I apprehend that the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate would have any very good effect to do away with the difficulty that he suggests. The clause of the act of July 17, 1862, now proposed to be repealed, only authorized the President by public proclamation to grant amnesty to persons engaged in the rebellion, and the complaint that the Senator makes now is that private pardons, as I understand him, are being hawked around through the city. The repeal of the provision contemplated will do no good at all, but will increase, if possible, the difficulty that he refers to. It is not that the President has offered amnesty by public proclamation, but that he is pardoning individual cases that he ought not to pardon, as I understand the objection of the Senator from Michigan.

Now, Mr. President, I am not prepared to say how I shall vote after an examination of this subject; but I wish to assure the Senator from Michigan that it is not a question of such easy solution as he imagines. Some time during the last session of Congress I had occasion to look somewhat into this very question, and it is one of exceeding doubt in my mind whether the act of 1862 in this respect conferred any additional power upon the President; whether the President's power would not be equally great under the Constitution without the act of 1862 as it is with it. I am not prepared to say that such is the fact; but I am not prepared to say on the other hand that such is not the fact.

One of the most important inquiries to be made in this case is, whether the President, by virtue of the Constitution, can make public proclamation of amnesty at all. If so, it would be wholly unnecessary for us to repeal this provision of the act of 1862. Another very important question arises, whether a separate certificate of pardon granted in an individual case restores the property not already taken away from the individual. That is an important question, and one that was very learnedly discussed in the Supreme Court of the United States by the Senator who sits before me, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who held, I believe, the position that a pardon granted at any time restored an individual to all the rights that he had before.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not disposed of.

Mr. HENDERSON. Even where a suit had been commenced for the confiscation of property, if there had been no judgment of confiscation, the Senator held that the property reverted to the individual after pardon. In other words, that all the rights which had not been taken entirely from the individual by a decree of a court resulted back to him as a necessary consequence of the pardon.

That is a very important question to be considered, and I think that the proper place for this bill is the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire that this question shall be settled by that very learned committee. It is the proper place for the bill to go, and I really do not see the necessity of immediate action in the premises unless there be fear upon the part of the Senate that the President designs issuing a proclamation of amnesty to all the southern rebels. I have not heard any intimation of that sort, and I apprehend that he does not design anything of that character; perhaps he does not design to enlarge the privileges of pardon beyond what is contained in his amnesty proclamation of May, 1865. I apprehend not; but if there be any fears of that character, it might be well for the Senate so to say, and then I might change my course in regard to the present consideration of the bill; but otherwise I am clearly of the opinion that this bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a very important question, and one that cannot be disposed of by reference to the dictionaries. It involves some of the nicest political and legal questions, and I assure the Senator from Michigan that many difficulties will not be gotten rid of by the mere passage of this bill. I think, therefore, that the proper course is to refer it and let it be properly considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary the yeas and nays have been called for. The Chair will put the question on seconding that demand.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I had no intention of entering into this debate; and I came into the Senate this morning just as the distinguished Senator from Michigan rose to address the Senate on the pending question, which I understand to be a question of reference. I certainly think that this important and grave matter ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if I had any doubts on that subject, my doubts would be removed by the remarks which have fallen from the Senator from Michigan. That Senator has taken it upon himself to say here, from his own knowledge, as notorious, he said, as the records of a court of justice—importing, therefore, absolute verity—that pardons granted by the President of the United States were for sale in the city of Washington, and had been, and that, too, by women of bad character. Now, sir, since that charge is made, and from so distinguished a source—a Senator of the United States in his place—I think it is very proper and becoming that the Senate should refer a measure of this kind to the Committee on the Judiciary; that they should not go forward and pass in hot haste a bill upon this subject with such a charge preferred against the President of the United States—a charge which, if true, I need not say, renders him liable to impeachment.

Well now, sir, without knowing much about this matter—I profess to have no personal knowledge—I take it upon myself, in my capacity as a Senator here, in my place utterly to deny the charge. I say the charge is not true. The Senator has been misinformed; he has been most grossly misinformed. The President of the United States is not guilty of the crime which he in his misinformation alleges against him; and I do not think it is proper that such a charge as that should be made against the President without a particle of proof being adduced to sustain it. I, of course, am not prepared to go into that case; I am not prepared to set before the Senate the real facts with regard to it; but I have heard that charge made, and I cannot sit here willingly and hear the charge without a denial; and I take it that my denial is as good as the Senator's assertion. I say that the distinguished Senator has been misinformed, and I feel that he will be as glad as any one else to hear it. While, as I said before, I am not prepared to go into details, and am not particularly conversant with the facts, I know enough of the case to be enabled to inform him—and I am sure he will be glad to hear it—that the charge is utterly untrue.

Mr. CHANDLER. I simply stated what was on the records of a court in sworn testimony. The charge has been established before a court. My information is derived from one of the judges of the court before which the case was tried. The records of the court show it, and therefore I called attention to the facts. But now, sir, as it seems to be the wish of the Senate that the bill should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, I desire to withdraw my call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays having been ordered, it can be withdrawn only by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? ["None."] No objection being made, the call is withdrawn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There being now no objection to the reference of the bill, I do not know that I ought to detain the Senate; but I think that in consequence of what fell from the Senator from Michigan I ought to say a word, lest the impression might go out that those who favored the reference of this bill were opposed to the object contemplated by it. Now, the Senator from Michigan knows that he was no more zealous for an efficient confiscation bill during the war than myself. I believed during the war that we ought to have a confiscation bill that was effective, and I did all I could in this body to secure the passage of such a measure. The confiscation bill which did pass was emasculated and not effective; but such as it was, it has never been efficiently executed. And, sir, I think I go quite as far as the Senator from Michigan in opposing, in the manner it has been done, the restoration to rebels of property which was taken under the confiscation act. But here is a bill that comes to us now, proposing to repeal a section of that confiscation act which was never, in my judgment, as effective as it ought to have been; and we are asked to pass it at once, and without referring it to any committee.

Now, sir, I am not opposed to this; but I believe it better to do business deliberately and in order. We have our rules of proceeding in this body—established to promote the transaction of public business—and experience has shown that the object is best accomplished by their observance. The ordinary course of proceeding is to refer a bill to the appropriate committee; it is very seldom that a bill is passed by this body without a previous reference to some committee; and I think it safer to adopt that course in this case. I assure the Senator from Michigan that this course is not dictated by any opposition to the object of the bill; but I think the effect of its passage will be better on the country when it shall be seen that we act deliberately and in the usual way. Let us first see what duty requires, and then calmly, dispassionately, and resolutely perform it. I know of nothing to be gained by passing the bill to-day; and if it is proper that the bill should pass, as I think it is, a reference can do no harm; and whether it be advisable to pass it or not, I assure the Senator, as far as I am concerned, that its consideration shall not be unnecessarily delayed. The motion to refer was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced the passage by the House of a joint resolution (H. R. No. 212) to appoint two managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to fill certain vacancies; and also the adoption by the House of a concurrent resolution reappointing the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction; in both of which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SUMNER. I now offer certain resolutions, which I ask to have read and printed.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolutions declaring the true principles of reconstruction; the jurisdiction of Congress over the whole subject; the illegality of existing governments in the rebel States, and the exclusion of such States with such illegal governments from representation in Congress and from voting on constitutional amendments.

Resolved, 1. That in the work of reconstruction, it is important that no false step should be taken, interposing obstacle or delay; but that, by careful provisions, we should make haste to complete the work so that the unity of the Republic shall be secured on permanent foundations, and fraternal relations shall be once more established among all the people thereof. 2. That this end can be accomplished only by following the guiding principles of our institutions as declared by our fathers when the Republic was formed, and that any neglect or forgetfulness of those guiding principles must postpone the establishment of union, justice, domestic tranquillity, the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty, which are the declared objects of the Constitution, and therefore must be the essential object of reconstruction itself.

3. That this work of reconstruction must be conducted by Congress and under its constant supervision; that under the Constitution Congress is solemnly bound to assume this responsibility; and that, in the performance of this duty, it must see that everywhere throughout the rebel communities loyalty is protected and advanced, while the new governments are fashioned according to the requirements of a Christian Commonwealth, so that order, tranquillity, education, and human rights shall prevail within their borders.

4. That, in determining what is a republican form of government, Congress must follow implicitly the definition supplied by the Declaration of Independence, and, in the practical application of this definition, it must, after excluding all disloyal persons, take care that new governments are founded on the two fundamental truths therein contained; first, that all men are equal in rights; and secondly, that all just government stands only on the consent of the governed.

5. That all proceedings with a view to reconstruction originating in executive power are in the nature of usurpation; that this usurpation becomes especially offensive when it sets aside the fundamental truths of our institutions; that it is shocking to common sense when it undertakes to derive new governments from that hostile population which has just been engaged in armed rebellion; and that all governments having such origin are necessarily illegal and void.

6. That it is the duty of Congress to proceed with the work of reconstruction, and to this end it must assume jurisdiction of the States lately in rebellion, except so far as that jurisdiction may have been already renounced, and it must recognize only the loyal States or those States having legal and valid "Legislatures" as entitled to representation in Congress or to a voice in the adoption of constitutional amendments.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the motion to print is put, I desire to say that at this stage I do not propose to discuss these resolutions. I have introduced them now as a statement of the case. I see no chance for peace in the rebel States until Congress does its duty by assuming jurisdiction over that whole region. These resolutions declare briefly the duty of Congress in that regard, and assign reasons therefor. I have said that I have no purpose now to discuss them; but I have in my hand a letter which I received yesterday from a friend of our cause in Texas, and which is so important in its statements and so direct in its bearing on the questions raised by these resolutions, that with the indulgence of the Senate I will read briefly to it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Allow me to ask the Senator to read the signature. Let the name of the writer be given.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not read the signature.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Ah! Ha!

Mr. SUMNER. And for a very good reason—that I could not read the signature without exposing the writer to violence, if not to death.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I ask if the reading of the letter by the Senator from Massachusetts is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, a Senator in making a speech to the Senate has a right to read from a letter in his possession if he deems proper.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask whether it is in order for the Senator from Massachusetts to make a speech at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sees nothing disorderly in it. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor; and while proceeding in order he cannot be seated by a question of order upon his general right to speak. The Chair thinks the Senator from Massachusetts is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. The letter is dated in Texas, November 19, 1866, and, as I have already said, it came to my desk here yesterday. I read as follows:

—, TEXAS, November 19, 1866.

DEAR SIR: The really loyal men in this part of Texas concur in thinking that the first move of the Republican party at the approaching session of Congress should be the passage of an act abolishing the sham State governments that have been set up in the South without authority of law, and declaring all their acts, except so far as on revision they may be affirmed by competent authority, to have been null and void from the beginning. If that is done we think that everything else required to be done will be easy. Petitions will be sent on from here to that effect. Governor Hamilton will be requested to have them presented.

Our so-called Legislature adjourned on Tuesday last. It was a worse and more disloyal body than the convention. All its members, except about six, showed by their speeches, proposed bills, and acts, that they were not merely in law, but in fact, public enemies of the United States. The laws they have passed are infamous and amount to neither more nor less than a cunningly-devised system intended to effect a practical restoration of slavery. I refer to their public and general laws, and not to the batch of roguish charters and special statutes which they have enacted. Some of them do not contain the word "freedman," but they are aimed at the poor freedmen nevertheless. For example; the acts in regard to labor, trespasses, apprenticeship, stay of execution, exemption and regulating county courts, are intended to reestablish slavery, and that in a worse form than before, under which the responsibility for the sick and the very young and aged will not be attached to anyone in particular. The leading object of our legislators seemed to be to make contracts to labor specifically enforceable, and at the same time, by stay and exemption laws, the contracts to pay for the labor unenforceable. By the county court act they arranged it so that the freedmen could be got in the way of prosecution for offenses without the intervention of a grand jury.

I sincerely hope that Congress will declare that no statutes of limitation shall be held to operate in the insurrectionary States until they are reorganized and readmitted. The act of 1864 is not broad enough. Limitation should not, on principle, be held to run where there are no lawful tribunals.

I learn from persons of character that some of the members of our "Legislature" (Mr. Short, an ex-rebel captain, for instance) boasted in private that they had never taken the amnesty oath prescribed by the President, and that in one county of Texas where only thirteen of the inhabitants had taken that oath some two hundred voted at the last election. Will Congress prescribe an oath? If so, ought it not to require all inhabitants, without regard to sex, race, or color, under penalty of being precluded, in case of neglect or refusal, from inheriting, or asserting rights in any form in any court of justice, to register themselves and take the oath which may be prescribed? I have inserted the word "sex" after much reflection. The women keep the rebel spirit active in the South. All women fear to take a judicial oath, and in general observe one when taken. If the rebel women who now exult and exasperate only swear allegiance they will subside into quietude. Besides, the registration might furnish the census of the South now wanted.

We have been in a horrible state of suspense here. Had the earlier northern elections gone against the Republican party I should have had to promptly make my escape from Texas, if, indeed, I could have got off at all. The spirit of rebellion down to that time had waxed fiercer and more intolerant than it was at the middle of 1861. Many loyal men left, and all who could, and with whom I conversed, told me they were preparing to leave. Since those and the later elections the rebels, through policy, have been more quiet. Deeming it my duty to remain as long as practicable, in order not only to aid in any move thought advisable, but to keep the loyal press of the North informed of the actual condition of affairs here, I have remained and suffered. If Congress does not wipe out all that has been done, but abandon the loyal whites and the poor freedmen to rebel rule, I must and will emigrate. Many others will do the same. In what a horrible condition will those be who cannot get away!

I remain with high respect, your obedient servant,

HON. CHARLES SUMNER, of the United States Senate, Boston, Massachusetts.

That is a letter from a gentleman with whom I have been in correspondence now for some two years, whose character I know well, and for whom I vouch. I should not read the letter on this occasion if I were not entirely satisfied of the character and intelligence of the writer. It is in the nature of testimony which the Senate cannot disregard. It points out the way to our duty. We must, sir, follow the suggestions of this patriot Unionist and erase those governments under which these outrages are perpetrated. The writer calls them "sham governments." They are governments having no element of vitality. They are disloyal in origin, and they share the character of the rebellion itself. We must go forth to meet those governments and the spirit in which they have been organized, precisely as in years past we have gone forth to meet the rebellion. The rebellion, sir, has now assumed another form, and our conflict is no longer on the field of battle, but it is here in this Chamber and in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol. Our strife is civic, but it should be none the less strenuous.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, "none the less strenuous" if "strenuous" will achieve the true victory. The Senator from Massachusetts reads a letter from Texas. I do not rise to answer his argument, because it is only on a motion to print; but it is somewhat within the confines of my memory that I was in Texas in 1836, and I am somewhat conversant with all that part of the world, of which I think the Senator from Massachusetts is altogether ignorant. I have been through all that part of the world, although I was born further north than him, and denied the doctrine of slavery as early as he did; perhaps earlier; I do not know.

I rise to express principally my objection to his habit of getting up and reading letters from gentlemen from Texas, for I have been there, where I am known and have been known for at least thirty years. Whom does the letter come from? Probably an adventurer over there who writes very good English; perhaps he may have even graduated at Harvard, that the gentleman is conversant with and that I am not. As for the authority of the letter, I should like to have an indorser—the indorsement of the name of the man who wrote it and not the indorsement of a man who is ignorant, because it is my opinion that the Senator from Massachusetts never floated down the Mississippi, and never saw the State of Texas, and never saw a southern State. I do not say he did not; but I doubt whether he did. It has been my opportunity to have lived and been about all the States of this Union, and I belong to them all from Maine to Texas, California included. Of course this is not an argument, Mr. President. I only say that I do not like this thing of letters being read. I have my arms full of letters sometimes, but I never read a letter from a man who would not put his signature to it, and I have never said a word where my opinion was not on my sleeve.

The motion to print the resolutions was agreed to.

MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. WILSON. There has been sent to us a resolution from the House of Representatives to elect two managers for the Soldiers' Home, and I ask unanimous consent to put it on its passage now. The board meets to-morrow, and it is important that these managers should be elected to-day, perhaps in order to constitute a quorum of the board.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 212) to appoint two managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill certain vacancies, was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appoint Erastus B. Woolcott, of the State of Wisconsin, a manager of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of George H. Walker, of the third class of managers, for the term which expires on the 21st day of April, 1868; and John L. Cavender, of the State of Missouri, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of P. Joseph Osterhaus, of the second class of managers, for the term which expires on the 21st day of April, 1870.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVY-YARD EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all orders, instructions, and directions made or issued by him, or by the chief of any bureau in his Department, since the 1st day of April last, in relation to the employment of officers, master-workmen, mechanics, laborers, or other persons in the navy-yards of the United States; and that he transmit to the Senate copies of all communications received by him or by the chief of any one of the naval bureaus on the subject of the employment of persons in the navy-yard at Norfolk, Virginia, as well as copies of all communications from him or such chiefs of bureaus to any and all other persons touching the subject of employment at such yard.

PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate take up, with a view to reference, the joint resolution that I offered early in the last session proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to restrict the presidential office to one term.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask the Senator, does he change the term in his proposed amendment? Does he change it to six years?

Mr. WADE. The proposition is to restrict the office to one term of four years. My motion will be to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to consider it now. I only wish to say on this occasion that I believe it is the most favorable opportunity to make this amendment that there has been since the formation of the Constitution of the United States. It has been the opinion of some of the wisest statesmen, or those who were deemed the wisest, at almost every period during the existence of this Government, that it was a defect in that instrument that it failed to limit the occupancy of the office to only one term. I have no doubt that the reason which superinduced this was that General Washington was contemplated universally as the first Chief Magistrate, and in him such confidence was reposed that it seemed to throw the statesmen of that day off the ordinary caution that they exercised in almost every other portion of the Constitution.

Nobody can fail to see that in the vast and growing patronage and power of the presidential office there are temptations to the incumbent, all the time weighing upon his mind like gravity, to wield the concentrated powers of the Government in such a way as he believes will conduce to his reelection. I believe every one who has watched with vigilance the administration of our Government during all its periods will admit that this has been so. I do not wish now invidiously to point out the peculiar action of any particular Administration; but any one acquainted with the action of the human mind and the motives which govern it knows that it is not safe to leave in the hands of any man such temptations as arise from the fact that he can use these vast powers to promote his own ambition.

There has rarely been a time, however, when such a proposition could be moved and not seem to be invidious. I believe, in the progress of this nation from one Administration to another, that this idea, which shrewd statesmen saw early, has been growing, till now everybody seems to understand that there is an evil which needs correction. Without going into the argument, merely suggesting the great importance of the measure, I simply say that all parties for several years seem to have been of the opinion that this defect should be remedied. President Washington thought so. President Jackson and almost all our eminent statesmen from that time to this have seen this defect and wished it might be corrected. They did not, however, find an opportunity when it was probable that they could get the necessary vote to effect it. Such has been the condition of parties generally in this Government that it was almost a hopeless task to ingraft this amendment upon the Constitution. There now is an opportunity, and I believe every man is sensible that the correction ought to be promptly applied. I hope, therefore, that the Judiciary Committee will take up this great subject, consider the resolution that I send to them, and if it is not correct in their judgment, if it wants amendment, I hope they will apply the amendment, and at an early period report it back that Congress may act upon it.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that under the 21st joint rule which was brought to the attention of the Senate on the first day of the session, the motion made by the Senator from Ohio would not be in order, because it refers to business which cannot now be acted on under the decision made by my predecessor in this chair, which was that bills, resolutions, and all unfinished business could not be considered until after the first six days of the session. Under that decision this motion would not be in order.

Mr. McDUGALL. I understand that it was courtesy to the Senator to allow him to pursue his remarks. It will be courtesy to me if I make a remark—the courtesy of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will interpose no objection even to the consideration of the resolution, but suggests simply that under the former decision it is not in order. The Chair recognizes the Senator from California.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire simply to suggest that the amendment which the Senator from Ohio proposes would meet with my entire approbation if the term should be made six years, and at sometime I would like to advance that idea to the Senate supported by careful reasoning. It will come up, of course, afterward. His amendment is simply to limit the Presidency to a single term. I say a single term of six years. I only want to suggest it that it may be recorded. I agree with the Senator from Ohio; I think he is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made to the consideration of this subject, the Chair will put the question. The Chair deemed it his duty to state that the motion was obnoxious to the question of order if any Senator thought proper to raise it.

Mr. McDUGALL. Is it a question of consideration or a question of reference?

Mr. WADE. I wish to say about that rule of order that I understand it is construed very differently in the House from what it is in this body, and I cannot see the force of it any way. I saw that the Chair, when the question was first raised, put a very different construction on it, and a different construction I understand prevails now in the House. I think this is a very inconvenient one and almost destroys all business for the first six days of the session. I wish that the decision might be reconsidered and our practice made to conform to what I understand is the construction placed on the rule by the Speaker of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that there has been no objection made to the consideration of this subject, and the Chair will put the question to the Senate on taking up the joint resolution and referring it.

Mr. McDUGALL. If it is a question of reference, I have no objection. If it is a question of present consideration, I have objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution named by the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 33) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WADE. Now, I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion was agreed to.

FINANCE REPORT.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances be referred to the Committee on Finance, and also that five thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate. The report itself has already been ordered to be printed, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to refer the report to the Committee on Finance will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection, and the motion to print extra copies will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as concerns our foreign relations be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the finances of the United States be referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the homestead law and the public lands of the United States be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the Pacific railroad be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That so much of the President's message as relates to the Post Office Department and the postal system be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the bill (S. No. 452) to prevent and punish the illegal appointment of officers of the United States, heretofore introduced by him, was taken from the table, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices, heretofore introduced by him, was taken from the table and referred to the joint-select committee on retrenchment.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate bill No. 1 be printed. It is the bill referred to in debate the other day, to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia. I desire to say that I hope the Senate will indulge me on Monday next in calling the bill to their attention. I move now that it be printed, together with the amendments which have been adopted and those which have been proposed.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the joint committee of fifteen on reconstruction, appointed during the last session of Congress, shall be reappointed under the same rules and regulations as then existed, and that all the documents and resolutions which were referred then be now considered as referred to them anew.

The resolution was concurred in.

WIDOW OF HON. J. H. LANE.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the resolution which I had the honor to present on the first day of the session, relative to the payment to Mrs. Lane of the balance due to her deceased husband, be taken up for reference.

Several SENATORS. Let us pass it now.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution received its second reading.

Mr. POMEROY. If there is no objection, I should like to ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to rise to make a motion for that purpose. I see no necessity for a reference to a committee of a resolution of this kind. I believe it is in the usual form in such cases.

Mr. POMEROY. It is.

The resolution was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and is hereby, directed to pay out of the compensation fund of the Senate, to Mrs. — Lane, widow of Hon. James H. Lane, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Kansas, the amount of compensation due the deceased at the time of his death.

SUPERINTENDENT OF PRINTING.

Mr. LANE. I move to take up the resolution which I introduced on Monday, on the subject of the election of a Superintendent of Public Printing, with a view to refer it to the Committee on Printing.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to; and the resolution was adopted as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the election of Superintendent of Public Printing by a concurrent vote of both Houses of Congress, and to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 5, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The following members appeared in addition to those heretofore reported:

New York—Hon. James M. Marvin and Hon. Giles W. Hotchkiss.

Tennessee—Hon. Edward Cooper.

New Jersey—Hon. E. R. V. Wright.

Maryland—Hon. Hiram McCullough.

CORRECTION.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a correction of the proceedings of the House as reported in the Globe. I am reported in the Globe of yesterday as having voted against the passage of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELLIOT]—a bill to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862. I desire to state that was an error, as I was unavoidably absent from the House when the vote was taken, and if present would have voted for the bill.

LAWS OF DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the laws of the Territory of Dakota for 1865 and 1866; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORT OF GENERAL BABCOCK.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the House the report of the tour of inspection of Brevet Brigadier General Babcock, made during the past season, or such portions thereof as he may deem proper to communicate.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 664, for the regulation of appointments and removals from office, was recommitted. The motion to reconsider was made by myself at the last session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The motion is now before the House, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the indulgence of the House I will now proceed to state the objects of the bill reported by your committee, along with some of the considerations which have commended it to their judgment as a measure of great national concern, and one which falls within the constitutional powers of this Congress.

The first section enacts that no officer who has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be removable except by the same agencies, with the proviso, however, that in case of disability or misconduct in office during the recess of that body, the President may, with the advice of the Attorney General, suspend the incumbent and commission another until the next session, at which it shall be his duty to report the fact, along with the causes of removal, and the name of the officer so appointed, or such other person as he shall choose to nominate; and that in case of the refusal of the Senate to approve the act, the officer so suspended shall resume his functions, without any allowance, however, of compensation in the meanwhile.

The second section provides that no officer renominated shall continue to hold after his rejection, and that the party so rejected shall not be again appointed.

The third section I propose, with the approbation of the committee, to strike out, and insert two others—one to the effect that where a vacancy happening during the recess may have been filled by the President, it shall be his duty to make a nomination before the end of the next session, and in case of the nomination of any other person or persons than the one so commissioned, and the refusal of the Senate to advise and consent thereto, the office shall not be considered as vacant upon its adjournment, but the person so commissioned shall continue to hold and enjoy the same during the recess, and until he shall be either nominated and rejected, or duly superseded by a new appointment; and the other providing that the heads of Departments shall hold their offices for the term of four years unless removed with the concurrence of the Senate; and shall moreover nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, all their assistants and subordinates, to hold for the like period, unless removed in the same manner.

The bill rests, therefore, on the hypothesis that the power of removal does not rightfully belong to the President alone—even if he can be properly claimed to have any share of it, under the Constitution—and cannot be safely left with that officer without any restraint upon its exercise; and this as a general principle, and without any reference to the merits or demerits of the existing functionary. It proposes to improve the rare advantage of a dissociation between the party in power here and the President of its own choice, for the correction of a great evil, by a surrender and dedication of the spoil which that party may be supposed to have won, upon the public altar, and for the nation's benefit, through all coming time.

It aims at the reformation of a giant vice in the administration of this Government, by bringing its practice back from a rule of its infancy and inexperience, resting mainly, perhaps, on its unbounded confidence in the personal virtues of its first Chief Magistrate, to what are believed to be the true spirit and meaning of its fundamental law.

To accomplish this object it disturbs no title, and attacks no judicial precedent. It strikes not even at any prescription with "the hoar of innumerable ages" upon it. It contemplates but the review of a legislative opinion of yesterday, under the lights that a miraculous growth and an era of revolution have shed upon it, along with the resumption of a constitutional power that has been heretofore surrendered.

Nor is this the first occasion on which that opinion has been questioned. It was anticipated by a denial of an authoritative character. It was the opinion of a divided court. There has been no time, I think, at which its soundness has not been disputed. It has been subjected again and again to the most damaging criticism by the best professional minds of the nation. It has found no favor anywhere, I think, upon the score of reason. It is not even old enough to be venerable. There is nothing irreverent, therefore, in its impeachment, even though time might be supposed to consecrate error, or a prescription to run against truth or reason in the forum of the statesman.

To estimate justly, however, the weight to which it is entitled, it is necessary to show its precise extent, the circumstances by which it was attended, and the argument on which it was sustained, before proceeding to discuss the question on original grounds and with a sole reference to the Constitution itself, on the hypothesis that it is still an open one.

It is to be noted, then, that while it was objected widely in advance of the adoption of the Constitution, by those who were opposed to it, that it would give to the Executive the powers of a King, it does not seem even to have occurred to those who were the most ingenious in exploring and exaggerating its defaults, that there was anything in it which could be construed to bestow on the President the eminently regal power of displacing the officers of the Government at his own individual will. It does appear, however, to have been argued by its friends, in answer to the objection of instability through frequent changes of administration, that inasmuch as the Senate was to coöperate in the business of appointments, and "its consent would therefore be necessary to displace as well as to appoint, a change of the Chief Magistrate would not occasion so violent or so general a revolution as might be expected if he were the sole disposer of the offices." (Federalist, No. 77.) The undisputed assumption, therefore, that the President could not remove, was one of the arguments on which the briefness of his tenure and the frequency of elections were defended, and the instrument itself commended to the support of the people of the States by the leading spirits who presided at its formation.

When the First Congress met, however, to inaugurate the Government then newly formed, the question arose at once, on the establishment of the Department of Foreign Affairs, whether the head of that bureau should be made, in terms, removable by the President; one party claiming that the power of removal was included in the power to appoint, and could, therefore, be exercised only in connection with the Senate, and the other, with Madison at its head, asserting with equal confidence, that it was a strictly executive function, and as such, conferred on the President by the first section of the second article of the Constitution. The result was, not a decision, but what better deserves to be characterized as a compromise or evasion of the question, by the substitution for the words, "to be removable by the President," of the phraseology, "whenever the said principal officer shall be removed by the President, or in any other case of vacancy, the chief clerk shall take charge of the papers," &c.; a result which by no necessary inference imported anything more than an implied or permissive authority, which the Opposition was ready to accord to the President on personal grounds, but which the friends of that officer, claiming it under the Constitution as his right, were not willing to accept as a grant. In this shape, however, after a protracted contest and a close division in the House, the bill was passed through committee in the Senate by the casting vote of the Vice President, and finally by one majority. It is worthy of remembrance, however, that the Vice President was John Adams, and the President himself a man without "that sin by which the angels fell," who had never betrayed a trust or abused a power; and that, moreover, the weight of the argument turned on the improbability of future degeneracy, and the liability to impeachment in case of possible corruption or profligacy in future times. But succeeding Congresses went still further, in making the tenure of offices over which the Constitution had endowed them with exclusive and unquestionable control, dependent on the pleasure of the Executive, and the nation acquiesced under an experience of forty years, which seemed to justify the confidence that the virtues of its first Chief Magistrate had inspired. It was not until it was startled from its security in 1829 by the new and atrocious doctrine, that the public offices were but the lawful plunder of contending factions, and the profligate cry that "to the victors belong the spoils," that it began seriously to inquire into the wisdom and lawfulness of a practice that had grown up sub silentio, and apparently fastened itself upon the Government. The result of that inquiry, however, was a general conviction that there was no warrant for it in the Constitution, and no more of force in the argument that had been allowed to prevail, than there was of the prophetic spirit in the statesmen who were so prodigal of their assurances that no evil could flow from it, and that the corrective would be an easy one. That conviction was shared by the very ablest men of the nation, who had been trained in the study of its Constitution under the light of nearly half a century's experience, and were agreed upon the necessity of such a reform as would bring the Government back to its true principles. Mr. Webster, in a speech made by him in the Senate in 1835, holds this emphatic language:

"After considering the question again and again within the last six years, I am willing to say that in my deliberate judgment the original decision was wrong. I cannot but think that those who denied the power in 1789 had the best of the argument. It appears to me, after thorough and repeated and conscientious examination, that an erroneous interpretation was given to the Constitution, in this respect by the decision of the First Congress."

And again:

"I have the clearest conviction that they [the Convention] looked to no other mode of displacing an officer than by impeachment, or the regular appointment of another person to the same place."

And further:

"I believe it to be within the just power of Congress to reverse the decision of 1789, and I mean to hold myself at liberty to act hereafter upon that question as the safety of the Government and of the Constitution may require."

The like opinion was obviously held by both Kent and Story, and the same is inferrible from the report made by Mr. Calhoun to the Senate, on the subject of removals from office, in 1835. If earlier authority were necessary, however, it may be found, not only in the Federalist, but in a letter of Alexander Hamilton to James McHenry, then Secretary of War, written in 1799, and about ten years after the debate in Congress that is supposed to have settled this question.

It was in vain, however, that the statesmen of a later period, in view of the enormous abuses that threatened to overthrow the just balances of this Government, and to dwarf all its other departments under the overshadowing growth of the executive, pointed out the error into which we had fallen, and the rocks upon which the ship of state was driving with such headlong impetuosity. A triumphant party, supported, as it was almost sure to be, by an unscrupulous majority in both Houses, and looking to the offices of the Government as its lawful spoil, was sure to resist, and resist successfully, every attempt to get back to the true reading of the Constitution; while this power of resistance was equally sure to be strengthened by the increase of the means of corruption in the multiplication of the Federal offices. That increase was, even in ordinary times, but a natural and necessary result of our marvelous growth as a nation. The exigencies of the war through which we have just passed, and the new and heavy responsibilities it has left behind it, swelling our armies beyond example, and necessitating the establishment of a new department of the public service, that permeates the land, and enters the castle and unlocks and inspects the cupboard and the strong-box of every citizen, have administered to it an impulse that has carried it beyond the remotest point it was likely to have reached in the course of another century. The Executive of this nation, with its own tacit consent, now wields a power over the fortunes of its people, that would, in ambitious hands, and if adroitly used, be sufficient, not only to buttress and sustain a throne, but to make him the envy of the proudest potentates of Christendom. He has not hesitated to proclaim aloud that he intends to use it to enforce his will; and upon this hint I now propose to strip him of the ability to make good his menaces, by reasserting the authority of Congress, and taking back into its own custody, and for its own defense, the jewel with which it has so generously and improvidently parted in the honeymoon of its existence, when all was confidence and love.

And now as to the extent of the decision, the length and breadth of the swaddling-clothes that are supposed to fit us now, and cramp the movements of a giant State in the direction of reform. Confounded as it has been with a practice that has only followed out its spirit, its effect, I think, has been greatly magnified in the general estimation. In itself, and apart from the debate to which it gave rise, it decides absolutely nothing, except that in the absence of all legislation, the power of removal, in cases of appointments confided to the Executive by the Constitution, belongs to him alone. It rules nothing as to cases where the term is fixed, or as to inferior officers, where the mode of appointment is left entirely with Congress. The question involved was as to the heads of the Departments only, and although the line of demarkation has never yet been authoritatively drawn between the superior and inferior officers of the Government, it may be safely assumed that as the head—which is the constitutional phraseology—is superior to all the other members of the body, so these functionaries are to be classed among the superior officers whose appointment is vested by the Constitution, though only sub modo, in the President. There was no question, however, as to the power to regulate the duration of the office. It stood indefinite on the bill. In that condition it was not disputed that the tenure must be either at pleasure, or during good behavior. The Constitution had assigned the latter to no other officers except the judges, and the inference was irresistible that all others must hold their places by the former, unless Congress should give some other duration to their offices. (2 Story's Commentaries, sec. 1537; 1 Lloyd's Debates, 511, 512.) The point in dispute was only at whose pleasure they were to be held; whether at that of the appointing power, or of the President alone. And this accords precisely with the statements of both Kent and Story, the two leading commentators on the Constitution, and unquestionably the highest authorities in the country. The former describes it as "a question whether the power of removal in case of officers appointed to hold at pleasure, or where the duration is not specially declared, resided anywhere but in the body that appointed." (1 Kent's Commentaries, sec. 14, pages 308-11.) The latter puts it in the same way, by condensing the whole issue into the two great questions: first, to whom, in the absence of all legislation regulating the duration of the office, does the power of removal belong? And second, if to the Executive, in cases confided to him by the Constitution, can Congress give any duration to the office not subject to the exercise of such power? (2 Story's Commentaries, sec. 1537, citing 1 Lloyd's Debates, 511, 12.) The latter of these two questions has not, he says, been raised, because all our legislation has recognized the executive power of removal as in full force, and the case here rests, of course, only on a silent practice, which had the recommendation of convenience, and was maintained by the harmonious coöperation of the several departments of the Government, and a well-authorized confidence in the Executive, which is now greatly disturbed, if not altogether destroyed. As regards, however, the former of these questions, they are equally agreed that the decision was an anomalous one. Judge Story speaks of it as "constituting the most extraordinary case, in the history of the Government, of a power conferred by implication on the Executive, by the assent of a bare majority in Congress, which has not been questioned on many other occasions." (2 Commentaries, 1543.) Chancellor Kent, referring to the fact that it had never been made the subject of judicial discussion, and that the construction given in 1789 had continued to rest on "this loose, incidental, and declaratory opinion of Congress," and although suggesting that it might now be considered "firmly and definitively settled," is constrained to speak of it, as "a striking fact in the constitutional history of our Government, that a power so transcendent as that which places at the disposal of the President alone, the tenure of every executive officer appointed by the President and Senate, should depend on inference merely, and should have been gratuitously declared by the First Congress in opposition to the high authority of the Federalist, and supported, or acquiesced in, by some of those distinguished men who questioned or denied the power of Congress to incorporate a national bank." (1 Kent's Commentaries, sec. 14, pages 308-11.) The Chancellor does not speak with the precision of the lawyer, and forgets his own statement, when he describes it as a power which places at the disposal of the President alone the tenure of every executive officer appointed by the President and Senate. He does show, however, the training of the judge, in his remark that the construction based on such foundations might now be considered as "firmly and definitively settled." Nobody but a man with a religious reverence for precedents, could have supposed that an ephemeral practice of forty years' continuance, upon a question of governmental power so important as this, could settle forever the meaning of the fundamental law of a great State. It required six centuries of struggle to settle down the constitution of England on the basis of the Great Charter, and no parliamentary precedent of the reigns even of the Plantagenets or the Tudors, was allowed to stand in the way of the progressive movement that culminated in the Revolution of 1688.

It is worthy of remark, moreover, that neither of these justly distinguished jurists has intimated a doubt as to the power of Congress to regulate the duration of the inferior offices in such a way as to take them entirely out of the control of the Executive. Judge Story, on the contrary, observes that "as far as Congress has the power to regulate and delegate the appointment of inferior officers, so far they may prescribe the term of office, the manner in which and the persons by whom the removal as well as the appointment to office shall be made." (2 Story's Commentaries sec. 1537, citing Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 155.) And again: "If there has been any aberration it will be difficult, perhaps impracticable, now to recall the practice to the correct theory. But at all events it will be a consolation to those who love the Union, and honor a devotion to the patriotic discharge of duty, that in regard to inferior offices, which probably include ninety-nine out of the hundred, the remedy for any permanent abuse is still within the power of Congress by the simple expedient of requiring the consent of the Senate in such cases." (Ibid., sec. 1544.) And Chancellor Kent indorses this in a note, referring to the frequency of the exercise of this power by President Jackson, as having created serious doubts as to the propriety of the concession by the First Congress, and remarking that a high authority had declared it to be in the power of Congress to correct this by placing the appointment of inferior officers in other hands. (1 Kent's Commentaries, 309-11, citing 3 Story, 394-7.)

And this is in accordance also with the legislation of the Government on more than one occasion, although it is assumed by those who rest upon the practice, that it has been invariably the other way. The early case of Marbury vs. Madison proves this beyond dispute. Marbury was a justice of the peace for this District, appointed by John Adams just before his retirement, under the authority of an act of Congress of 1801, fixing the term at five years. President Jefferson withheld the commission after it had been signed and registered. If he could have removed the officer, it would have been idle to stand upon the delivery of the commission, but it was assumed by the court, and conceded on all hands, that he was not removable, except for cause, until the expiration of his term.

But even in the case of an office determinable at pleasure, as that of deputy marshal, an act passed by the very Congress of 1789 itself, not only recognizes and asserts the right to take the power of removal from the President, but to sever it from the appointing power itself, by vesting it in the judges of the circuit and district courts. (Act of 24th September, 1789.) And in a still later case, (act of March 3, 1865, section twelve,) it has been provided that where an officer in the military or naval service, who may be dismissed by the authority of the President, shall demand a trial, he shall convene a court-martial, and if they shall not award the punishment of dismissal or death, or the court shall not be convened within six months, the order of dismissal shall be void; and this notwithstanding the fact, that the punishment by impeachment is confined by the Constitution to civil officers, and therefore, by necessary inference, all others are removable in a different way, and although, too, the President is, by virtue of his office, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

To show, moreover, that this was the interpretation given to the legislative action of 1789, and is in accordance with judicial opinion in the States, upon analogous provisions in their own constitutions, it is only necessary to refer to a decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, made as early as 1820, and when its judges were unusually eminent, to the effect that the tenure of ministerial offices in general is during pleasure, unless the law establishing the office orders it otherwise. (Com. ex relatione vs. Bassier, &c., 5 S. & R., 457.)

And now, having, as I think, ascertained and defined the precise extent of the decision supposed to have been made in 1789, let us proceed to look into the argument by which it was sustained, and ascertain what the Constitution itself has to say on this subject.

It is agreed, then, on all hands, that the power of removal must reside somewhere, when the term is indefinite. This bill denies it to the President alone, in all cases where the Senate has shared in the appointment; or, in other words, declares that nothing short of the power that makes shall unmake—which is but the logical result of the doctrine of the minority in 1789, that the power to remove is included in or but an incident to the power to appoint; a doctrine, which is now sustained, as I shall show hereafter, by the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States.

On this point, however, the Constitution is silent, except so far as it is made a part of the judgment in cases of conviction on impeachment for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Nobody has ever pretended that it was anywhere expressly conferred but in this single case, where it is lodged exclusively with Congress. If it exists, therefore, at all, it is only by implication or inference.

Taking it, however, to rest, as claimed, either upon the power to appoint, as an inseparable incident thereof, or on the general assignment of executive powers to the President alone, it becomes important to look into the provisions of that instrument which bear upon these two subjects.

And first, it is to be observed, that the Constitution nowhere vests the appointing power in the President alone. It authorizes him to nominate, but only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, the officers therein described, and "all others that might be established by law." This, therefore, is the general rule.

The exceptions, if they can be so termed, are first, that "in cases of vacancy happening during the recess of the Senate," and when that body is, of course, in no condition to be consulted, and to coöperate; or, in other words, where an appointment is impracticable, for the time being, under the rule, the President shall, not appoint, but merely supply the interregnum, or "fill up the vacancy" by a commission which shall only endure "until the end of the next session," or until they shall be in a condition to exercise their power of concurrence in or rejection of an appointment: and secondly, that in cases of inferior officers, the Congress may bestow on "the President alone," or the heads of Departments, or the courts, the privilege of appointing without the advice or consent of the Senate, which is a recognition of the rule, and makes a solemn act of the Legislature necessary to dispense with it even in inferior cases.

It would seem, therefore, too clear for dispute, if it has not the force of a self-evident proposition, that the framers of the Constitution intended to place an effective check upon the President in this important matter, by denying to him in all cases the right to wield this formidable power alone, except where the accidents of administration might render it temporarily necessary, or the insignificance of the place might make it safe, in the judgment of the Legislature, to intrust it to him from time to time.

It is claimed, however, in the absence of any direct authority to appoint, and in the face of the strongest implications to the contrary, that the President may practically defeat the obvious purpose of the framers of the instrument, by the exercise of the power to remove in the recess, and thereby create a vacancy, which he may fill up without the concurrence of the Senate, or by appointing to an office already full, and thus accomplishing by indirection the very same thing.

But what does the Constitution say on the subject? Why, only that "the President shall have the power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions that shall expire at the end of their next session."

The power, then, is not to appoint, but to "fill up." The vacancy is not one that may be created, but one that may "happen." And the commission is not one that is indefinite, but one that shall expire, by its own limitation, at the end of the next session, so as to give the President the whole of that session to nominate.

Upon this transparent phraseology one would think that there could be no ground left for dispute. The case provided for is that of "all vacancies that may happen." Hap is but another word for chance. Ex vi termini, it imports accident or casualty, without any agency on the part of the President in bringing it about. And such is the construction which it has received from the best intellects of the nation. Mr. Hamilton, in his remarks in No. 77 of the Federalist, on the same language precisely, as applied to Senators, describes it as "an express power given in clear and unambiguous terms to fill casual vacancies." And again, in his letter to James McHenry, ten years afterward, he asserts that they imply casualty, and denote "such offices as, having been once filled, become vacant by accidental circumstances."

And in accordance with this idea, when Mr. Madison, during the recess of 1813, appointed ministers to negotiate the treaty at Ghent, upon a question made whether it was the case of a vacancy or a new creation, the Senate is reported as having entered its protest against it.

Again, on the 20th April, 1822, it was held by the same body, that the President could not create the office of a minister, and make appointments during the recess, it being their understanding that the vacancies provided for were such as occurred from death, resignation, promotion, or removal; that the word "happen" had relation to some casualty not provided for by law, and that if the Senate was in session when the office was created and no nomination then made, he could not appoint during the recess, because it was not a vacancy, happening at that time. In many instances where new offices were created a special power had been conferred on this account to fill them during the recess, and it was then said that in no other instances had the President filled such vacant offices without special authority of law. (2 Story's Commentaries, 1559, citing Sergeant on the Constitution; 2 Executive Journal, 515, 500; 3 Executive Journal, 297.)

And this opinion is affirmed by the second section of the act of 9th February, 1863, which provides that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury as salary to any person appointed, during the recess of the Senate, to fill any vacancy in any existing office, which vacancy existed while the Senate was in session, and is required by law to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until such appointee shall have been confirmed.

And to show, moreover, that the earlier practice had conformed to this theory, may be added the remark of Mr. Calhoun in his report to the Senate in 1835, on the corrupting influence of the President's power of removal, that "so long as it was the practice to continue in office those who had faithfully performed their duties, this patronage, in point of fact, was limited to the mere power of nominating to accidental vacancies, or newly created offices."

It is perfectly obvious, moreover, from the tenure of the commissions required in such cases, that this exceptional provision was only intended to meet the case of an accident occurring at a time when the Senate was not at hand to be consulted. To supply a vacancy is one thing, and a thing easily understood; to create a vacancy is a thing so different, as must have necessitated a different phraseology, and suggested a more stringent rule. Nobody would pretend that a removal, by the usual process, by the President, while the Senate was in session, was a case of vacancy happening at that time, or indeed any case of vacancy at all. A new nomination approved by it, in a case where the term was not fixed, would operate, no doubt, as a supersedes, by determining the office, but without making any vacancy whatever; and this I believe is the way in which the thing has been generally done. I do not know that there are any instances wherein a removal has been made in the first place, except, it may be, where the office was made expressly determinable at the will of the President. If he may make a vacancy in any case, he may do it in all, divest the Senate of its advisory power, and make the exception the rule. All he has to do is to withhold the appointments so made until the expiration of the session, or, upon rejection of any of his creatures, recommitment them after the adjournment, and thus perpetuate the power in himself, in defiance of the clear intention of the framers of the Constitution. And this he has actually done to such an extent, that if not seasonably checked, the Senate itself will soon have practically ceased to share all that part of the appointing power which it may not already have substantially surrendered by its complaisance.

Nor does it seem improbable that this has been the studied purpose in high quarters, in view of the imputed illegitimacy of the body which is now supposed to be "hanging, as it were, on the verge of the Constitution." The law officer of the Government has just been asked, with special reference, perhaps, to the act of 1863, whether a vacancy happening during the session, is not a vacancy happening during the recess; and he answers in the traditional spirit of an Attorney General, with an opinion that blots out of the Constitution the words "that may happen during the recess of the Senate," by making it entirely indifferent what may be the causes by which that vacancy is produced, or at what time it may occur. Nay, more. The very commissions now issued will be found to run, not only at "the pleasure of the President," where the tenure is indefinite, but even in cases of appointments made during the recess, where the very terms are prescribed by the Constitution itself, are interpolated with the same anti-republican phraseology, in utter disregard of the express provisions of that instrument.

To the whole claim, however, of so formidable a prerogative, it ought to be a sufficient answer: first, that the Constitution nowhere confers any such power, except in the cases already stated, and that from this exception, by well-settled rules of construction, the inference is a legitimate one, that it was not intended to be exercised in any other way, in civil cases at all events; and second, that the exception which gives to Congress the authority to vest the appointments to inferior offices in the President alone, is as utterly irreconcilable with the idea that he can remove alone, and without cause, in the case of superior offices, as is the provision for impeachment and trial, with the notion of a summary ejection without any hearing at all.

But, then, it is insisted that this mode of removal would be inconvenient, because the machinery is too elaborate for ordinary use, and would be entirely inadequate to meet the exigencies of a vast and multiplied service, and the many unforeseen contingencies that might necessitate the existence of a jurisdiction more summary and extended; and hence the illogical inference of a power in the President to remove where the Constitution itself has not spoken.

I will not stop to examine the argument ab inconvenienti, even though so great a name as that of Coke may be invoked to show that it prevails in law, where one construction would be more mischievous than another. It may be inconvenient to impeach in all cases. It was hardly expected, perhaps, that it would be necessary. It may be inconvenient to the President and his southern friends, that he is not endowed with dictatorial powers, such as he has been claiming and exercising. It may be inconvenient to him that he cannot indulge the parasites who swarm around him, by the unrestricted use of the guillotine under which so many heads have already fallen. It would be certainly very convenient to him and his southern friends, but very inconvenient to the nation, that he should be allowed to do all the things that this bill is intended to prevent. But all this is only an argument in favor of a change in the law, or an amendment of the Constitution, which, in the view of the President, is not now amendable, for reasons that would dethrone Congress, and unseat himself.

Is it, then, a necessary power? And if so, why? Because, it is said, the officer may prove incompetent or unfaithful, and the public interests may therefore require his dismissal. Granted that they may. What follows? That he may remove him? That is a non sequitur. The result of an admitted necessity, without any constitutional provision to meet it, would seem rather to be that the case was left to be provided for by law, than that a power so dangerous should be raised by implication in the President. If there be a necessity, Congress can provide for it, under its authority "to make all laws which shall be necessary or proper for carrying into execution all powers vested in the Government, or in any department thereof." It is a capital error to suppose that the Executive is endowed with the incidental power to legislate for constitutional defects which touch his office. To claim that it belongs to him, in virtue thereof, is no more or less than the assertion of a dictatorial power to the extent of the very terms used by the Romans in conferring it. If the President is to do everything which in his opinion the public interests may require, then every defect in the Constitution or laws is to be supplied, and every disproportion symmetrized by him. And this, it seems, is the opinion of the present law adviser of the Government, as expressed in his recent answer to the inquiry as to the power of the President to fill vacancies occurring during the session of the Senate. It is with him a necessary power, and though it may be so wielded, as he admits, as to oust the jurisdiction of the Senate entirely, he marches up to the reductio ad absurdum with a courage that might have graced a better cause, and thinks to put us off with the answer, that it is no objection to a power that it may be abused. If it had been an express power, the argument would have been a good one. Where, however, it is only implied, as here, a well-trained lawyer, who could forget his office in his profession, would have said at once that the possibility of such an abuse was a conclusive argument against the existence of the power. It would be asking, perhaps, too much, to expect that an officer who holds his life at the pleasure of the President should be found standing in the way of the prerogative in times like these. When was it ever heard that an Attorney General in High Prerogative times had faltered in the support of the most extravagant of the pretensions of the Crown? How many judges have proved capable of emulating the sturdy virtue of Sir Edward Coke, before the Act of Settlement that made their tenure independent of the royal will? Possibly there are men here who are prepared to indorse such slavish views. Every traitor in the South, and every Democrat in the North who sympathized with him, would doubtless agree to them, as they have agreed so generally, that the President might organize State governments, and ordain State constitutions, while we are denied the humble privilege of suggesting amendments in the interests of liberty, and denounced as no better than "tinkers"—I was going to say tailors—by the minions and upstarts, the pampered and insolent menials, who lick the royal hand, and look up beseechingly for the "bread and butter" that are flung contemptuously into their hungry jaws.

In default, however, of the arguments from inconvenience and necessity, is there anything in the suggestion that this power of removal is a part or incident of the power of appointment? If there were, it would not help the case, because the appointing power is nowhere lodged in the President alone—the power to act during the recess being a mere authority to fill up vacancies ad interim—and the power to remove, on this argument, could only be exercisable in conjunction with the Senate.

But the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly decided that there is, and has on this point affirmed the opinion of the minority in the Congress of 1789. The case Ex relatione Heenan (18 Peters, 280), which was that of the removal, by the presiding judge, of a clerk of the district court of Louisiana, distinctly rules that, in the absence of all constitutional provision, or statutory regulation, it is a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment. The removal there was by the judge who appointed. Upon the theory of the majority the power would have resulted to the President.

And here I might rest the argument with those who stand upon authority, and are willing to accept a judicial opinion in the place of a legislative precedent.

But assuming that this power is but an incident, and so belonging to the Senate, in conjunction with the President, it is not only insisted that where no tenure is prescribed, the officer must necessarily hold at the will of the appointing power, but assumed that no other tenure is admissible.

It is not necessary, however, that the tenure should be indefinite; and it is perhaps not safe, and not strictly in harmony with the spirit of our institutions, to leave it so, if the power claimed resides with the President, and may be exercised without cause, or without other reason than the want of personal subserviency to himself.

The Constitution looks to the creation and establishment of all offices under it by the act of the law-making power, and in no case but that of the judges, and appointments made to fill up vacancies ad interim, undertakes to prescribe the tenure by which they are to be held. But the power to create an office involves, of course, the power to determine upon its duration and duties, to say what it shall be and when it shall expire; the power, in short, to make all laws which may, in the judgment of Congress, be necessary and proper for its regulation, including the period of service and the causes of removal. I know no limitation on the power of Congress here, except in the assignment to the President, in all cases but those of inferior offices, of the right to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint. Whenever an office is created of the superior class, that power devolves, under the Constitution, upon him, and cannot, of course, be taken away. But with this exception only, and the cases of judges, and of appointments to fill vacancies, their jurisdiction over the subject is absolute. If there be anything to restrain or limit it beyond this, it behooves those who so assert to show where it is to be found.

It is a fair inference from the provisions just recited, that the framers of the Constitution intended to leave the question of official tenure in all other than the excepted cases to congressional regulation. To suppose that they designed it to be indefinite, and therefore determinable at the mere will of the appointing power, and without responsibility for abuse, even though that power were understood to comprehend the Senate, would be a violent presumption indeed. To conclude that they intended to make it determinable at the mere will of the President, either with or without cause, in view of the extreme jealousy with which that department was regarded, is absolutely incredible.

I take it, therefore, that Congress may dispose of this question, even in the case of the superior offices, by defining the tenure and changing the character of the estate, so as, in effect, to substitute its own will for that of the President, by giving to it the form of law, in accordance with the principles on which this Government is founded. An executive will is only admissible in the case of a despotic Government, of which it is the very essence and expression. The "sic volo, sic jubeo; stet pro ratione voluntas," is not the maxim for a republican State.

But there is another ground—the one assumed by Madison, and perhaps the only one on which these royal pretensions have ever been plausibly defended—and that is, that the exercise of the power of removal, the same being in its very nature an executive function, falls necessarily within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution which declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States;" that all executive powers not denied or lodged elsewhere, are thereby vested in the President; and that every participation of the Senate is an exception to a general principle, and ought to be taken strictly.

This argument assumes, in the first place, that the power of removal is essentially an executive power, as I understand it to be just now asserted by the Attorney General to be. I know no reason to warrant the assumption. Whether it be so or not, will depend, I suppose, on what the Constitution makes it. There is nothing in the act itself, that decides it to be a ministerial function only. It involves the exercise of a discretion that does not belong to ministerial officers. So far as the Constitution makes provision for its exercise, it gives it a judicial character entirely. True to the idea on which our institutions rest, it leaves nothing here to the mere will of the Executive. No man's fortune is made dependent on a caprice that would make him a slave. If an officer is to be removed, it declares in what manner it shall be done, and that it shall be only on sufficient cause, and with the privilege of an impartial hearing, which this bill is intended to secure. To infer, as seems to be imported by the argument, that it is an executive function, merely because the officer who is the subject of it may happen to be an executive officer, would be the most inconsequent of conclusions. If it were true, then the election or removal of a President, or a Congressman, or a judge, would be an executive, legislative, or judicial act, according to the quality of the subject with which it had to deal, and without reference to the manner in which the act might be performed. It is the manner of performance, however, that is to determine the character of the act. It is a possible case, I suppose, that a man may be legislated out of office, by repealing the law creating it, or making the tenure dependent on the will of Congress. Clearly a circuit or a district judge may remove the clerk whom he has appointed, because that power is held to be an incident of the power to appoint, wherever the tenure is indefinite; but nobody has ever claimed that the President can do it, or would think of calling the act an executive one. If Mr. Madison and the Attorney General were right, however, in claiming it as an essentially executive function, the decision in ex parte Heenan was erroneous, and the power belonged to the President alone.

If, however, the assumption, that the power of appointment or removal was a purely executive one, was without warrant, as I think it was, there is an end, of course, to the argument based upon it, that the participation of the Senate was an exception to a general principle, and ought, therefore, to be strictly construed.

But even though the function were, in its essence, an executive one, it does not then follow that it was conferred on the President, by the clause which vests the executive power in him, unless it can be held that all power that would be regarded as executive in England, passed by the general grant—as it is claimed to be—whether it was embraced within the scope and purview of the Constitution or not. Mr. Madison insisted that the clause in question carried everything that was not either expressly denied, or lodged in other hands. If it did, there is no prerogative of the British Crown that might not be claimed for him, because there are no negative words to restrain his powers. We must look, however, to the Constitution itself in order to interpret the intent of the grant—if it is to be so considered. It is bad logic to infer that anything passes by it that is not to be found in the Constitution at all, because that would enlarge the grant beyond the purview of the instrument. If he had qualified his statement, by saying that it carried everything within the scope and spirit of the Constitution, that was purely executive, and not denied expressly or by implication, he would have conformed to a rule of construction, that in the search for truth is universally recognized, and absolutely essential to light up the devious passages and darkened chambers, that so often perplex the inquirer in the exploration of the meaning of the lawgiver. There was no more reason for excepting an express denial than an implied one, and no excuse for the omission when he was arguing the case of an implied or inferential power. But to infer the existence of that power from language so general, without reference to the context, or the subject-matter, and in the face of an express provision pointing out the method of impeachment, is something in the way of argument, that not even the deservedly great reputation of Mr. Madison himself can commend to the favorable judgment of a disciplined logician of the present day.

It seems to have been considered, however, that the power of removal was conferred by a sort of necessary implication, because the President is the responsible head to whom all others are subordinate, and bound by his oath for the faithful execution of the law, and that the power was incidental to the duty, and might be requisite for its fulfillment.

Whether this much-talked of responsibility of the President amounts to anything in practice, or can be held to go beyond an honest endeavor on his part to see that the laws are faithfully executed, so far as he is endowed with the means of enforcing them, is more than can be safely assumed, and more, I think, than any friend of the Executive would care to affirm. It does not, however, follow, ex necessitate, that although there were a failure of duty on the part of the officer, the power of removal would then belong to him either qua Executive, or as general residuary legatee or trustee under the Constitution. It is neither essential nor desirable that the officer should be responsible to him, or subject to his will. This would be to turn the faces of the public servants in the direction of the President, just as the fire worshippers salute the opening glories of the king of day, or the sun-flower is supposed to "swing the circle" of the horizon in adoration of its God. There is a responsibility to the law, as there is a way of removal indicated by it, which is in nowise dependent on the executive will, that holds the officer to the performance of his duties, and is the only practical security for those who are interested in it. Any other is more imaginary than real, so long as it is enough for the President himself to say that he is irresponsible because he is without power in the premises. He would be equally so in effect with all the power that he claims. He may say that he wants more than the Constitution intended to give him, that it is our interest that he should be gratified, and our necessity that he should be enabled to do our work; and a facile Attorney General, holding his own place by what he regards as the necessary tenure of executive pleasure, will be always found to attribute to him all he covets, upon the convenient plea of an overruling public necessity. He will do this naturally, because he sees no power in the state, except the one under whose shadow he reposes. If he cannot torture the Constitution into a grant of it, he will raise an incidental authority out of a supposed necessity, for the fulfillment of a general duty. The framers of the Constitution supposed that it might require an express grant even to the legislative department, to make such laws as might be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested in the Government. But they did not stop here. They looked to legislation only to supply the needs of the other departments, and provided them an auxiliary in Congress to aid them in the execution of their duties. They have done away, therefore, with the necessity of a resort to incidental powers in the Executive. If there is a casus omissus in the law it is for Congress to apply the remedy. But it required no constitutional provision for this purpose. Every Government has the inherent, because necessary, power of regulating the tenure and conduct of its own officers, and displacing them at its own will, except where it is expressly forbidden by its fundamental law. If the law is silent or defective it imports no surrender of so important a function, and no lapse to the executive magistrate.

But what is there at last in the clause that vests the executive power in the President? Nothing more than in the corresponding clauses that vest the legislative power in Congress, and the judicial in the courts. In any sense, it is but a distribution or assignment to each of these departments, of its appropriate share of the powers actually conferred on the Government by the Constitution. To say that this is in the nature of a grant that passes all power that may in any sense be regarded as executive, whether conferred by that instrument or not, is something in the way of construction, that can find no more favor with the statesman than with the lawyer. In an absolute monarchy, where everything depends upon a single will, all powers may be said to be executive, because there is no law but that will, which judges and executes itself. It will hardly be contended that the clause in question was intended to make the will of the Executive so large a part of the administration of this Government.

Is it true, then, that upon such a case as this, a mere acquiescence, or even a vicious practice of three quarters of a century, is to canonize a doctrine that is so manifestly in conflict with the spirit of our Government, and the very letter of our Constitution? I have asked on another occasion—I now repeat the question—what is a century in the life of a State? What would be thought, moreover, of a constitutional amendment, or a declaratory law, broadly enunciating and establishing the doctrine, that the President may appoint and remove all officers whose tenure is not made by the Constitution dependent on good behavior, of his own unassisted volition, and without regard to the merits or defaults of the objects of his bounty or his displeasure? Would Congress or the people agree to such a proposition? And yet this is precisely what is now claimed for him, and what he is now actually doing, on the hypothesis of a Cabinet minister, that the offices of the Government, as the rightful appanage of the Crown, are his property, and those who fill them were intended to be the mere creatures of his will.

When it was suggested in the debate of 1789, that this enormous power might be thus abused to the destruction of our liberties, the answer was, that this was impossible, and would constitute a clearly impeachable offense, if done, and upon this point there was apparently no divided sentiment. Since that time, and especially after the lapse of the first forty years, it is not to be denied that the patronage of the Government has more than once been brought in conflict with the freedom, not only of elections, but of opinion. It was reserved for us to hear it publicly and defiantly declared, for the first time in our history, to be the settled intention of the Executive to use the patronage we gave him—ay, to foot the objects of his predecessor's trust, as he "would spurn a stranger cur, over his threshold"—for the purpose of overruling the judgment of Congress, and bending the whole nation to his will; and the results of the elections in Philadelphia and New York, so happily overruled by the healthful influences of the country, show that it was no idle menace on his part.

But what avails either the supervisory power of the Senate, or the remedy by impeachment, which was relied on by the Congress of 1789, as against a high delinquent who holds the spoils of a nation in his hands? Has the constitutional brake been put down even where it might have been? And if it were, how is it to help us, when the jurisdiction of the Senate is ousted by the many ingenious devices of tyranny, that have found a ready support in the opinions of the law officers of the Government? May it not be said with truth, and without offense, that the Senate itself has tacitly countenanced, if not approved, removals for opinion's sake—the very offense that would have warranted an impeachment, in the judgment of the Congress of 1789—by confirming nominations made obviously on no other grounds? What, then, are we to hope from the slow and doubtful and, perhaps, obnoxious process of impeachment, where the criminal is a President, and a vote of two thirds is required to convict? If you would impeach successfully, you must strip him of his power over the fortunes of the citizen. No glittering bauble must be allowed to dazzle the vision, or tempt the cupidity or the ambition of either the prosecutor or the judge. No army of stipendiaries must be allowed to surround his person and depend upon his will. Invested with all these imperial prerogatives, and backed by the power of the sword, another President, with more discretion and wiser counselors, may threaten the public peace, and threaten it more successfully, by flinging himself into the arena, with an array more formidable than either the Household Swiss or the incipient Prætorian guard who lately mustered on the royal summons, and disputing with you the mastery of the empire.

Have not the people been already told by the Executive himself that we were too lavish of our confidence, and that they owed it to his forbearance and humility alone that he had not accepted the crown, and endued himself in the purple that we had offered him? Have they not been asked by his chief adviser whether they would have him for President or King? Reduced to his constitutional nakedness, he is still formidable enough, but not so formidable as to endanger our liberties. What is he without the use of the unrestricted patronage that he commands? But for that, is it within the range of probability that any Executive would have ventured to insult and defy the loyal people of the nation, by denouncing its high legislative council—the constitutional depository of its will—as a body of usurpers—"traitors on the other end of the line"—in actual rebellion against the South, and proclaiming that it was to his self-denial only that they were indebted for the preservation of their liberties? But for the prestige which it gives him, who would have thought it necessary to inquire whether the President would recognize the next Congress, or submit to the public will, or favor the adoption of the constitutional amendment by the rebel States? If he were indeed the "humble individual" we have so often heard of, who would send, or who would listen to the daily bulletins announcing royal conferences upon the settlement of the nation, or imperial resolves upon the great questions of war and peace with neighboring States? Without the power to reward his favorites, by putting a gold chain about their necks, and lifting them to the highest places in the kingdom, where was that spoil-engendered and spoil-inspired array—that formidable shape—

"If shape it might be called that shape had none Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb, Or substance might be called that shadow seemed"—

"the National Union party?" Who is there, in that case, of all the menials who have reechoed the classic oburgations with which the representative body of this nation has been assailed, that would have been so poor to do their author reverence? What else than the abject servility that flatters and intoxicates—unless it were the Providence that sent out Pharaoh with his captains in the pursuit of the fugitives of Israel—could have inspired the royal progress and the royal speech, and launched its victim on that crusade which ended so unhappily for himself? May I not ask, "Upon what other meat has this our Cæsar fed that he is grown so great?" Pass this bill, and the bloated and exaggerated power that now "bestrides this land like a Colossus," and bids us all "to hide between its legs and find ourselves dishonorable graves," will sink down at once into its constitutional and healthful proportions. Pass this bill, and you may dispense with the dead letter of the impeaching power, because no future President will then presume either to depose, or ignore the legislative authority of this nation, or to refuse obedience to the high behests of the people, as expressed through their Representatives. Heed not a vicious precedent, as big with ruin as the primal fault, the plucking of the fruit, "whose mortal taste brought death into the world." What though the Fathers may have erred, as did the first? Their fault may be repaired. It is of no consequence to us what the Congress of 1789 may have decided, or what any of their successors may have acquiesced in, if they were wrong, and the life of the nation has been imperiled by their error. The public interests, the safety of the State, the sentiments of the people, all demand some measure of the kind which this bill proposes; and this Congress will fail in its duty, and disappoint the just expectations of its constituents, if it adjourns without providing it. Reject it, and the golden opportunity—the ebb of the tide that has gone back under the earthquake shock of the ballot-box, and now invites you to build up a dike that the returning waters shall never overleap—is gone, perhaps, forever. It is not often that a President comes in with that kind of courage which is required for the betrayal of his party and his country, or the abandonment of the principles and pledges on which he was elected. It has never happened before—and perhaps never will again—that the party so betrayed has been honest enough, to fling the offices of the Government behind it, like the temptation in the wilderness, and strong enough, and courageous enough, to grapple successfully with the hydra it had unwittingly engendered.

The people are now here in their unclouded power. They have taken the Government into their own hands. They have rebuked and trodden down the arrogant pretensions of the Executive. They have stricken the veto dead in his hands. They have declared that he shall not stand at your doors to arrest your legislation, as he has publicly threatened that he would do. They have degraded him, for the time being, from your associate in council, to the mere minister of your will. It is their high and irreversible decree, that the public servant who presumed to deny their jurisdiction and yours, over the most momentous question of your history, shall stand aside until you have disposed of it, and then execute your judgment in good faith, whether it be agreeable to him or not. They have now reviewed and reaffirmed their decision of 1864, and again instructed you to enact such laws as you may think proper, and to see that they are honestly enforced, or that the impediment is removed. Pass this bill, as the first in the order of necessity, and the residue of the work will be of easy accomplishment. Reject it, and posterity will grieve that the courage which had conquered treason twice was not seconded by the spirit that might have shorn its locks, and bound it in everlasting chains.

We make history to-day. The classic Muse who looks down from her pedestal on this Chamber, stands ready, with uplifted style, to write the chapter that is to record the doings of this session. It behooves us to see that the judgment of a nation is not made void by the faint-heartedness of its Representatives. There is no time now for dalliance with the power that we have conquered. No gentle speech, "no candy courtesies," no dull oblivion of the pregnant past, befits the crisis that is on us now. We have just trodden the wine-press of Revolution, to encounter at its closing doors the bloodier form of Anarchy, while the untamed fiends of the rebellion, their appetites inflamed and their hands dripping with the blood of the martyrs, laughed—as none but the damned could laugh—at the rising vision, but dimly foreshadowed by the St. Bartholomews of Memphis and New Orleans, of the opening of another seal, which should turn our rivers into blood, and visit upon us and our children more than apocalyptic woes.

Over that precipice of ruin this nation has hung trembling for the last few months. The virtue and intelligence of a free people, inspired and directed by the providence of God, have bridged the fathomless abyss that yawned before us, and saved us from the horrors of this second death. We can now look back and measure the danger, and detect its source. We know its cause. Executive usurpation—despotic will— encouraged and reinforced by the unlimited command of all the offices of the Republic, and all the corrupting influences which they can employ, is written in flaming characters upon every rock that has threatened us with shipwreck. This giant power must be abridged if our peace is to be maintained, and our liberties made sure. The time is now to put a hook in the jaws of this leviathan that has tempested the waters, and moor him to his proper place under the Constitution. If we fail, the evil will go on swelling in volume, and accumulating a resistless momentum as it flows, until the one-man power, become all in all, enthroned in solitary state, like some volcanic peak, shall tower aloft, uncontrollable and supreme, over a nation of slaves.

Before the conclusion of the above remarks, Mr. WILLIAMS's hour having expired, on motion of Mr. SHELLABARGER, by unanimous consent, his time was extended.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to say now to the House, with their consent, I will ask for a vote on the motion to reconsider. I do not propose to urge the passage of this bill with any unnecessary rapidity. It is a matter of great consequence and requires careful deliberation. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With pleasure.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the motion to reconsider prevails, I desire then to submit a motion to refer this bill to the joint-select committee on retrenchment. This whole subject was expressly referred to that committee, and they have been engaged all of the present morning and have adjourned to resume the work to-morrow morning, in preparing a bill on the subject. They have before them the bill introduced by the select committee on the civil service, at the head of which is the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] who is also a member of the joint committee on retrenchment, and they have before them also a bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.] These bills, together with one which is now pending in the Senate, introduced by the Senator from Oregon, the committee propose to consider, and upon examination of the whole subject to present their views to the House in the shape of a bill as the result of their conviction of the necessity of some such legislation. I ask, therefore, that this motion may be reconsidered with a view to referring the bill to the select committee on retrenchment, promising that they will make a very early report—probably within the next forty-eight hours.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not see what this committee has to do with this bill at all. I think we had better, while we have hold of it, keep it. It is in good hands, and I hope it will not be put in worse.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not pretend to make a comparison between the merits or capability of this committee and my friend from Pennsylvania; but as to the authority upon which I act, I beg leave to read it to the House. We were instructed "to consider the expediency of so amending the laws under which appointments to the public service are now made as to provide for the selection of subordinate officers after due examination by proper boards, their continuance in office during specified terms unless dismissed upon charges preferred and sustained before tribunals designated for that purpose; and for withdrawing the public service from being used as an instrument of political or party patronage."

In short, this whole subject is by express provision referred to that particular committee. They were to take testimony in respect to what has been done in the nature of abuse under the law as it now stands, and are engaged in the consideration of the subject with all these various bills before them, and hope to be able to report in forty-eight hours such a bill as will provide a remedy for the evil. That is my answer to the gentleman. This should be referred to that committee, simply because they have been intrusted with the whole subject and have been at work during the greater part of the vacation since the last adjournment in looking into the entire matter.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary, having been reported by them at the last session after great deliberation, and, as some of us thought, very unnecessary delay. It ought to have been passed before this for the purpose of stopping some of the evils that have already taken place. The bill is now before us and open to amendment, and I hope it will not be referred to any other committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state in regard to this bill that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who has charge of it, to propose sundry amendments, one of which is to strike out the third section of the bill, and substitute thereof two other sections which he has prepared, and which have the concurrence of the committee. I have also an amendment which I shall offer at the proper time, and it seems to me that with these amendments we will present to the House a very perfect measure, as much so perhaps as any committee could present. It is not the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to urge a final vote upon this bill now, but it seems to me that the better course will be to keep it in the House until it is perfected here, and then pass it without any delay. It was first the intention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask a recommitment of the bill. I think the amendments would be agreed to if presented before the House, and I think we may as well consider the bill now. I hope, therefore, the bill will neither be recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary, nor to any other committee, but that we may have final action upon it without unnecessary delay.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire of my colleague whether, by the proposed amendments, any change has been made in the first section, which seems to conflict, unintentionally of course, with the Constitution where it says that no officer shall be removable except by the same agency which concurred in his appointment, not seeming to contemplate any impeachment? I find, also, that no provision is made excepting the heads of Departments from the operation of this law. I apprehend that very few of the members of the committee would desire to deprive an incoming President of the opportunity of choosing his constitutional advisers. I mention this for two purposes: one is to ask that the amendments be printed, and the other to suggest for the consideration of the committee the two points I have made in relation to the measure.

Mr. SCHENCK. In behalf of the committee on retrenchment I do not wish to be very tenacious about this matter, but I cannot see that the proposition which I have made is in any respect improper. After this bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, this House concurred with the Senate in raising a joint-select committee, consisting of three Senators and five members of this House, to which, by express provision and description of the service in which that committee was to be engaged, they intrusted the authority of considering and reporting upon this whole matter. This justifies, at least, the motion that I have made.

The select committee, although it may be inferior to the Judiciary Committee, think that from the testimony taken by them during the recess, they obtained some light for their guidance to enable them to legislate wisely and well upon this subject. They may be mistaken in their views. There may be a difference between their views and the views of other gentlemen upon this subject; but a bill of this kind ought to be very carefully prepared. The select committee took up this subject at its first meeting this session; they were engaged in its consideration this morning, and they have determined to take up the subject again to-morrow, when they hope to complete it.

In the course of this work we have considered five or six bills on this subject now pending in this House and the Senate, endeavoring out of the whole to select whatever was good, whatever was best expressed, and by a combination of the matters which seems best, to prepare a bill which shall meet the approval of both the House and the Senate. We have endeavored to discharge our duty according to the instructions of the two Houses. It is said now that this bill is as good as it can be made and ought at once to have the action of the House, and yet at the same moment we are told that it is defective and that several amendments have been prepared and will be offered to it, and then, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee tells us, it will be perfect.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will observe to the gentleman who is at the head of the committee on retrenchment, that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has not made any such claim.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not happen to be at the head of the committee on retrenchment, but am only by the concurrence of my colleagues put forward to make this motion. I only quoted the expression of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who said that the amendments proposed would make the bill perfect.

Mr. GRINNELL. He said he hoped the amendments would make the bill perfect.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, he said he hoped the bill would be perfect. I give the qualification. I do not wish to misrepresent the gentleman. I do not know that we shall be able to make a perfect bill. The only claim I make is that out of all the material before us, and with the amount of labor we have expended upon it, we think, if the House means to sustain the committee to which they intrusted this whole subject, and that, too, after this bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, it would be well perhaps to allow us to have formally and officially before us whatever may be in this bill, in order that we may report upon it along with the other matters which we have under consideration.

Of course we shall avail ourselves of what this bill contains, even if it is not formally referred to us. And if we can complete a bill better than anything contained in any other one bill—and we find something good in them all—we can move it as a substitute for this or any other bill under consideration. But I think it would be more regular to refer each bill upon this subject to the committee specially charged with its consideration. And in contrast with the obstinacy exhibited in relation to this bill—I do not use the word “obstinacy” in any offensive sense—let me state that the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES] is himself the chairman of a committee to which this subject was specifically intrusted, and has reported a bill from that committee which is now pending. But he is perfectly willing that his bill should go to the committee to which this whole subject was committed, and I commend his example to other gentlemen who are interested in this subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the vote has not yet been taken upon the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It has not. The Chair will state the question before the House. On the 11th of June last this bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, ordered to be printed, and re-committed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was re-committed; which motion he has now called up for the action of the House. If the motion to reconsider shall prevail, then the question will recur upon the motion to recommit; which motion will be amendable, should the House desire it, so as to refer the bill to any other committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may be considered ungracious in me, having already occupied so much of the time of the House, to call the previous question at this time. But I understand that the previous question, if seconded, will exhaust itself upon the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. Mr. WILLIAMS. As there will be ample opportunity for discussion after that motion shall have been disposed of, I will now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend that motion so as to refer this bill to the joint committee on retrenchment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would it be in order for me now to withdraw the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It would, and then the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] being in the nature of an amendment, would fail.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw the motion to recommit. And now I move to amend by striking out all of section three after the enacting clause, as follows:

That no office shall be considered as inferior, within the meaning of the Constitution, the salary and emoluments whereof exceed in amount the sum of $1,000 per annum; and in all such cases the appointments thereto shall hereafter be made on nomination by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, subject to the same conditions and limitations as to removals and renominations as are prescribed in the foregoing sections of this act.

And I move to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That whenever a vacancy in any office, happening during the recess of the Senate, may have been filled up by the President in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, by granting a commission to expire at the end of their next session, it shall be the duty of the President to make a nomination for the said office before the end of the next ensuing session of that body; and in case of the nomination of any other person or persons than the one so commissioned, and the refusal of the Senate to advise and consent thereto, the office shall not be considered as vacant upon the adjournment of the Senate, but the person so commissioned shall continue to hold and enjoy the same, and exercise the functions thereof during the recess of the Senate, and until he shall be either nominated and rejected, or duly superseded by a new appointment, by and with the consent of that body.

Sec. 4. That the several heads of Departments shall hold their offices respectively for the term of four years, unless removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall severally nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, all their assistants and other officers within their respective Departments, to hold for the like period of four years, unless removed by them, with the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire, whenever it may be in order, to offer an amendment, to insert the following as a new section:

That any officer of the Government of the United States, who shall appoint or commission any person to an office, in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and on conviction thereof, by impeachment or otherwise, shall be dismissed from office.

I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] that these amendments be printed, and the bill postponed until to-morrow, when we can have all the amendments before the House. In the mean time the committee on retrenchment may have their bill prepared, and may present it as a substitute for this bill. We then can have the whole subject before the House, with all the different propositions.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will state that the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa is a very acceptable one, because we think the committee on retrenchment will be ready to-morrow to report a bill as a substitute for all these propositions.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be understood that by unanimous consent the various amendments suggested by different gentlemen may be presented now to be printed with the bill and to come up to-morrow in regular order.

There was no objection.

Mr. KASSON. The amendment which I suggested a few moments ago, is as follows:

Strike out in the fifth and sixth lines of the first section, the words, “by the same agencies which concurred in his appointment,” and insert in lieu thereof the words, “by virtue of impeachment, or by the President, with the consent of the Senate;” so that the clause will read:

That no officer of the United States appointed on the nomination of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be removable except by virtue of impeachment, or by the President, with the consent of the Senate.

Add at the end of the first section the following: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the removal and appointment of the heads of the several Executive Departments.

Mr. STEVENS. I have an amendment which I desire to offer. It is as follows:

Amend the second section by striking out in the fifteenth and sixteenth lines the words, “the same office for which he had been previously nominated,” and inserting in lieu thereof the words “any office;” so that the clause will read:

And in no case shall any person who has been nominated by the President for any office and rejected by the Senate, or on whose nomination that body has failed or declined to act in the way of consent or refusal, be appointed or commissioned by him after the adjournment and during the recess of that body to hold any office.

Mr. HALE. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] by striking out, in section four, after the words “shall severally nominate and,” the words “by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;” so as to provide that the heads of the Departments shall “severally nominate and appoint all their assistants and other officers,” &c. I think that the terms of the gentleman’s amendment in its present form are inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution in regard to appointments to office.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who has charge of this bill, whether the amendment which he has offered makes it a misdemeanor for any disbursing officer to pay persons who are appointed to office in violation of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is nothing of that kind in my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I desire the privilege of offering the following amendment:

Add as a new section the following:

That any public officer who shall pay or receive any moneys, or advise or connive at, or consent to the payment of any moneys, in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and, on conviction thereof, by impeachment or otherwise, shall be sentenced to removal from office, and shall pay to the United States a sum equal to the amount of moneys so paid or received, to be recovered, with costs, by action of debt, in the name of anybody who may institute such action, for the use and benefit of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move that all the amendments be printed, and that the bill be postponed, and made a special order for to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER stated the morning hour had commenced, and the first business was the call of committees for reports.

CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 635, to amend an act regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1865, with an amendment.

The bill provides that on the trial of any offense in which the right of challenge to jurors now exists the defendant shall be entitled to only two peremptory challenges; provided that nothing herein shall apply to the trial of treason or capital offenses.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out “two” and insert “four.”

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, also from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 418, in relation to the qualifications of jurors in certain cases, with a substitute.

The bill provides that in trials for treason against the United States, and in trials for all other high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States committed by organized military force, with strong hand and by multitude of people, no juror shall be, by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion of the innocence or guilt of the accused, based upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or the common history of the times, provided he be otherwise competent, and upon his oath declare, and it appear to the satisfaction of the courts that, notwithstanding such opinion, he can and will impartially try the accused upon the crime charged in the indictment, and a true verdict give upon the evidence to be produced upon the trial.

The substitute was read, as follows:

That upon the trial of any person charged with treason, or with setting on foot, assisting, or engaging in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or with giving aid and comfort to any person engaged in any such rebellion, or with engaging in or giving aid and comfort to any rebellion or insurrection, whether such crime shall have been heretofore or may hereafter be committed, if any juror or jurors in such case and under examination as to his competency as such juror, shall state that he has formed and expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused and shall be objected to for that reason, the court shall thereupon proceed to examine said juror as to the ground of his opinion; and if it shall appear to have been founded on reading newspaper reports or upon rumor or hearsay, and not upon conversation with witnesses of the transaction or hearing them testify, and the juror shall say he feels able, notwithstanding such opinion, to render an impartial verdict upon the law and evidence, the court, if satisfied that said juror will render such impartial verdict, may in its discretion admit such juror as a competent juror in such case.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several courts of the United States, in addition to the authority now exercised by them, shall have power to select or order to be selected, by lot or otherwise, in such manner as they may respectively deem proper, or as the Supreme Court may by rule from time to time prescribe, such jurors as may be deemed necessary for the due administration of justice, and to issue and enforce process therefor, or order the same to be done in term time or in the vacation of said courts.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, this I understand is an amendment, coming from the committee, to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. A substitute.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would ask my colleague if it has been printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The substitute reported by the committee has not yet been printed. I will state, however, for the information of my colleague and the House, that the first section of the bill, or rather of the substitute, is copied substantially from the law of Ohio regulating the qualifications of jurors. That law my colleague is familiar with. It has been recently sustained by a decision of the supreme court of Ohio, in the case of the State vs. Cooper, decided at the last term of the court. I have never heard any objection to it from the bench or bar of Ohio. This substitute has been maturely considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I have been instructed, without any dissent, I believe, from any member of the committee, to report it and recommend its passage. I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to make this suggestion to my colleague, that inasmuch as this substitute changes entirely the qualifications of jurors, it would be but wise and proper that it should be printed, so that all the members of the House might see it and come to some conclusion on the subject. It proposes a very decided change from what has existed in former years. I am aware that Ohio has a provision substantially like the one that has been reported by this committee; but, sir, in the minds of legal men in that State, it is very questionable whether it is an improvement upon the old law. I believe in the main it is considered not to be; and that being so, gentlemen will at once see the necessity of weighing this question thoroughly before enacting it into the laws of the United States.

Why, sir, if an individual who is called upon to act as a juror in a case has expressed or formed an opinion, even from newspaper reports or from hearing A, B, or C express an opinion in regard to the facts of the case, is it not apparent that that man's mind is so biased that it will require some evidence in order to disabuse his mind before he can become an impartial juror? I am not, for one, prepared to say that this is a proper change for this Congress or for any State to make in regard to the qualification of jurors. We should seek to have men upon juries who are entirely free from any bias, who have neither expressed nor formed an opinion in the case. Then they are qualified to give due weight and credit to the testimony, and to render a verdict according to the preponderance of evidence. But by the provisions of this amendment they are not so qualified, because at the very outset you have got to overcome the bias that has been created by newspaper or neighborhood reports. I hope that my colleague will permit this substitute to be printed so that we may know better how to act in the premises.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. This amendment contains but a single proposition which any member can understand from hearing it read. This subject has long been before Congress. A bill was introduced in the Senate on the 5th of December last and was considered there. The same bill has been considered by the Judiciary Committee of the House, and as the substitute for the first section contains but a single proposition, which will be readily understood, it seems to me there can be no necessity for printing it. I hope the bill will be disposed of. I have never yet in Ohio, where a similar law is in force, heard any objection made by any lawyer, judge, or citizen to its operation.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, this bill may be all right, but of course it means to change the qualifications of jurors or else there is no necessity for it. If it does propose any such change I would like to see what it says. Whether it is very important that this amendment should be adopted I do not know, but in the present state of things I think we should be very cautions in making any changes in regard to our legal tribunals. While crimes ought to be punished and criminals brought to justice, I think it is better that they should be tried by no new law, no new qualification. I hope the gentleman will let it go over till Monday, and have it printed.

Mr. LE BLOND. I believe the previous question has not been seconded, and if not, I will move that the bill be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, no; not laid upon the table; let it be printed.

Mr. LE BLOND. Let it be postponed and printed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next, and that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are two or three postponed special orders which will be anterior to this.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I will move to postpone it until Tuesday, and that it be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have no objection to the postponement of the bill until Tuesday, so that it may be printed and the House may see it. I think it will be found that there is no objection to it.

Mr. STEVENS's motion was then agreed to.

RIGHT OF ACTION OF LOYAL CITIZENS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back bill of the House No. 693, to protect the right of action of loyal citizens, with two amendments; which were agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as passed, provides that in all cases where a citizen of the United States, who always remained loyal thereto and did not voluntarily give any aid or encouragement to any persons engaged in rebellion, shall bring an action to recover damages for injury to person or property, or the value thereof, no such action shall be defeated, or any defense allowed, by virtue of the authority of the late so-called confederate States of America, or of any State declared in rebellion by proclamation of the President of the United States.

PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 69, to provide for the payment of pensions.

The bill was read. It authorizes the President of the United States to establish agencies for the payment of pensions granted by the United States wherever in his judgment the public interest and the convenience of pensioners requires, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint pension agents who shall hold their offices for four years, and until their successors shall be appointed and duly qualified; provided, that no existing office shall be considered as vacated prior to an appointment by the President as provided by the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There are two or three amendments which I would like to suggest to that bill, and I will state them, if the gentleman from Maine will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. PERHAM. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the House paid attention to the reading of the bill, it will have seen that there is authority given to the President to establish agencies for the payment of pensions granted by the United States wherever, in his opinion, it may be necessary. Now, sir, I am opposed to giving that sort of authority to the President or to anybody else. I think we have a sufficient number of pension agents already established. And I am entirely indisposed to grant this further power to the President. I shall therefore move to strike out that part of the bill. And I will also move an amendment to the proviso, so that it shall be the duty of the President to send into the Senate the names of all the pension agents. There have been many removals during the past season of the most trustworthy pension agents we have, and most objectionable men have been appointed to their places. In my own State a pension agent was removed, and probably the most objectionable man in the State, particularly to the soldiers, appointed to his place. I want that man's nomination sent to the Senate, and have it pass that ordeal if it can.

Mr. BINGHAM. You will leave nothing in the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I propose to have this bill amended, let it affect it as it may. I propose to amend the bill so as to compel the President to send the names of all these pension agents to the Senate; making them in fact presidential appointments, instead of being made as they now are by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] whether it would not be proper to postpone the further consideration of this bill for say a week from Monday next; or until after the bill regulating the appointing power of the President shall have been acted upon, for the subject of this bill is involved, to a greater or less extent, in that bill.

Mr. PERHAM. There are some reasons why the Committee on Invalid Pensions desired immediate action upon this bill. I would therefore prefer that the bill should be acted upon now. But the committee will not make any objection to such amendments as the House may see proper to make.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the proviso, by striking out after the word "provided" the following:

"That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to vacate any existing office prior to an appointment by the President, as herein provided."

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the number of pension agencies in any State or Territory shall not in any case exceed three; and that no such agency shall be established in addition to those now existing in any State or Territory in which the whole amount of pensions paid during the fiscal year next preceding shall not have exceeded the sum of $500,000."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the bill should be further amended so as to embrace those appointments which have been made since a certain date, so as to cover appointments that have been made during the last year, and require their names to be sent in to the Senate for their action. The abuse has already been committed. In my own State one of the worst Copperheads in the State was appointed pension agent at Springfield not long ago. I want his name sent to the Senate, and let them pass upon it.

Mr. PERHAM. I can only seek to perform the duty imposed upon me by the committee, and that is to ask that the bill be put upon its passage. At the same time I will be willing to consent to any amendments which the House may think proper to adopt.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that this bill, with the accompanying amendment, be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I think there have been suggestions made which that committee would do well to consider.

Mr. PERHAM. I have no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the motion will be modified so as to include an order to print the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will modify my motion accordingly.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the committee have leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. That motion will require unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by WILLIAM J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution of the House (No. 212) to appoint two managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill certain vacancies.

SELECTION OF JURORS IN UTAH.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 404.

Mr. JOHNSON. What bill is it?

Mr. WADE. It is a bill to amend the charter of Utah.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether he intends to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. WADE. No. I have moved to take it up in order that an amendment may be offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] and ordered to be printed, and then the bill can be laid upon the table. I design to call it up, however, at a very early period of the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not suppose that the Senate will enter upon the consideration of this bill at the present time. It is only brought up by the honorable Senator from Ohio now for the purpose of enabling me to offer an amendment with a view to have it printed. The amendment is of considerable importance, and I therefore beg to present it to the Senate and ask that it be printed, and then the bill itself can lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print the amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that the bill is to lie on the table now; I believe that is the understanding. I desire to take up the resolution that I introduced yesterday in regard to the admission of reporters to the floor of the Senate, with a view of having it referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and the amendment will lie on the table, no objection being interposed.

The SPEAKER. That will be understood, and if there be no objection, the leave asked will be granted.

There was no objection.

If there be no objection, the Chair will understand that these gentlemen are excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAINE. I ask the House to excuse me from further service on the Committee of Elections.

There being no objection, Mr. PAINE was excused.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of conferring upon the Post Office Department the same jurisdiction and control over the various telegraph lines, now in operation or hereafter to be constructed, that is now exercised over post offices and post roads, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That Dorsey B. Thomas, who contests the seat now occupied in this House by Hon. SAMUEL M. ARNELL, from the sixth district of Tennessee, be allowed a seat on the floor of the House during the pendency of such contest.

DESERTION OF DRAFTED MEN.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I offered, on last Tuesday, a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for certain information in regard to deserters from the draft. The consideration of that resolution at that time was objected to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANCONA.] That gentleman is now willing that the House shall act upon it; and I ask that by unanimous consent it be taken up for consideration.

There was no objection; and the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to modify the resolution in one or two particulars, in accordance with the suggestion of a member. I wish to specify the period to which the inquiry is intended to apply, namely, since the commencement of the late rebellion. I also wish to include a provision requiring the Secretary of War to furnish us the reasons for which any drafted men have been exempted.

The resolution, as modified, was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the names of all persons who, having been duly enrolled and drafted into the military and naval service of the United States, failed to report to the proper authorities under such draft, or were for any reason exempted therefrom, showing the districts and sub-districts in which they were severally enrolled and drafted, and the grounds upon which any persons so enrolled and drafted were exempted; also, the names of all persons who, under the provisions of the twenty-first section of the act entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1865, forfeited their rights of citizenship and their right to become citizens, and became forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any right of citizens thereof, by desertion from the military or naval service, showing the residence and the company and regiment or ship of each deserter.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVALS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. DRIGGS. I rise for the purpose of calling up a similar resolution offered day before yesterday, calling upon the Postmaster-General for information, and which laid over one day under the rules, objection being made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and is hereby, requested to communicate to the House the following information:

1. The number and names of all postmasters in each of the States that have been removed since the adjournment of the last session of Congress.

3. The names of all new appointees.

4. Whether the salaries of any or all of the new appointees have been increased over that of their predecessors, and if so, to what extent in each case, and for what reasons, and to what sums such increase will amount in the aggregate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

The SPEAKER. It will have to lay over until regularly reached.

PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reorganizing the Pension Bureau, and providing clerical force and other assistants equal to the demands of its increased business, and report by bill or otherwise.

BUREAU OF REFUGEES, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of May 28, 1866, in regard to the amount of funds received by the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, from what source received, how expended, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 664, for the regulation of appointments to and removals from office, postponed till this morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SCHENCK rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire that the bill and amendments shall be made a special order for the same day as the one presented by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS.] I will modify my amendment offered yesterday so that it shall read as follows:

Strike out section three, and insert:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever a vacancy in any office, happening during the recess of the Senate, may have been filled by the President, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, by granting a commission to expire at the end of their next session, it shall be the duty of the President to make a nomination for the said office before the end of the next ensuing session of that body, and in case of the nomination of any other person or persons than the one so commissioned, and the refusal of the Senate to advise and consent thereto, the office shall not be considered as vacant upon the adjournment of the Senate, but the person so commissioned shall continue to hold and enjoy the same, and exercise the functions thereof during the recess of Senate, and until he shall be either nominated and rejected, or duly superseded by a new appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the heads of the several Departments of the Government shall hold their offices, respectively, for the term of four years, unless removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall severally appoint their assistants and all other subordinate officers appertaining to their respective Departments, subject to the approval of the Senate, on report to be made to that body if then in session, or if during the recess, at the next meeting thereof, to hold for the period of four years unless removed with the like concurrence of that body.

The SPEAKER. The modification will be made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the bill with the pending amendments, together with the bill submitted by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] be postponed till Monday next, after the morning hour, made the special order until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee on retrenchment have nearly completed a bill, and only meet to-night to put their work artistically together; and I ask leave that the bill shall be ordered to be printed in advance of the report. Perhaps they will be ready to report before to-morrow morning.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to accordingly.

MORNING HOUR.

The morning hour having commenced, the first business in order was the call of committees for reports.

No reports were offered.

RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER stated as the next business in order the calling of the States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Maine.

MURDER OF SOLDIERS

Mr. PIKE offered the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas three soldiers of the Army of the United States were murdered in October, 1865, in South Carolina, under circumstances of peculiar cruelty, and several persons were arrested, tried, and condemned by a military commission for said murder; and whereas said persons, so condemned, were subsequently reprieved and transferred to Fort Delaware, from which they were taken by writ of habeas corpus and set free: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to investigate the circumstances attending said murder, and by whose procurement and action said reprieve, transfer, and discharge were made, the consideration for the same, the reasons therefor, and all the facts connected with the same, and to recommend to the House such action, if any, as they deem the case requires; said committee to have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUNKEN VESSELS AT SANDY HOOK.

Mr. DARLING submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

UNITED STATES TROOPS IN MEXICO.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any portion of Mexican territory has been occupied by troops of the United States, and if so, by what authority, and for what purpose.

PROTECTION OF LOYAL CITIZENS.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill to protect all loyal persons in the insurrectionary States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PENSIONERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. MILLER also introduced a bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 with Great Britain; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the surviving commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the Army, and the surviving commissioned and non-commissioned officers and seamen in the Navy in the war of 1812, who have received honorable discharges and are in necessitous circumstances, and have not taken part in the late rebellion, and the widows of the deceased, shall have their names placed upon the pension-list of the United States at the rate of eight dollars a month during their natural lives, the pensions to be computed from the 1st day of April, 1865.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to have that bill passed now; and I demand the previous question upon it.

Mr. PERHAM. I hope that that bill will be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I desire to make that motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state whether this bill comes from a committee or not?

Mr. MILLER. It does not.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I hope the House will not pass the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The question was taken on the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 29, noes 74.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PERHAM. I now move to refer the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend that motion so as to refer the bill to a select committee of five.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, a motion to refer to a standing committee takes precedence of a motion to refer to a select committee. The question will first be taken on the motion to refer to the standing Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is that a debatable question? I would like to hear the reason why a special committee is desired.

Mr. MILLER. The reason why I ask that the bill be referred to a special committee is that last session the standing committee reported adversely upon it, and it was referred back to the committee with instructions to report in favor of it. The committee have a great deal of business on hand, and I have no doubt that if the subject shall be referred to a select committee, that committee will be able to report upon it at once. There are a few of these old soldiers left, and if we intend to give them pensions, now is the time to do it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire if the Committee on Invalid Pensions has not time to attend to the whole matter.

Mr. PERHAM. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have heretofore attended very carefully to all the matters that have been referred to us. I now demand the previous question on the motion to refer.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. PERHAM's motion was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW ORLEANS RIOT.

Mr. ELIOT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to proceed without unnecessary delay to New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, to make an investigation into all matters connected with the recent bloody riots in that city, which took place the last of July and first of August, 1866, and particularly to inquire into the origin, progress, and termination of the riotous proceedings, the names of the parties engaged in it, the acts of atrocity perpetrated, the number of killed and wounded, the amount and character of the property destroyed, and whether and to what extent those acts were participated in by members of the organization claiming to be the government of Louisiana, and report all the facts to the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms or his deputy, and the stenographer of the House, are directed to accompany the said committee; and that all the expense of this investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. The said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses under oath; also to appoint a clerk, and to report such appropriate legislative action as may be required, in view of the condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to accept an amendment to his resolution.

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear it.

Mr. NIBLACK. The amendment I would suggest is that the select committee also proceed to the city of Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, and investigate the riot that occurred there at the time of the visit of the President, in September last.

Mr. ELIOT. That is a distinct matter; and if the gentleman desires an investigation of it he can move a select committee for that purpose. The committee I desire to have appointed will have as much as they can attend to.

Mr. NIBLACK. It would be very little out of the way for the committee to go to Indianapolis. I think the same committee can investigate both subjects.

Mr. ELIOT. I call the previous question upon agreeing to the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Whereas it appears that the corrupt use of money to carry elections is becoming prevalent to an alarming extent: Therefore,

Whereas emigration, travel, and trade between the States of the Mississippi valley and the States of the Pacific coast have been and now are greatly interrupted by the hostility of the Indian tribes on the great plains; and whereas it is a reproach to our Government that its citizens cannot pass from one portion of the national domain to another without danger to life and property at the hands of a few thousand savages: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to this House what addition to the force of the regular Army would be required to thoroughly protect communication by two great routes across the continent, to wit, a route upon the general line of the Union Pacific railroad, and a route upon the general line of the Northern Pacific railroad; and that he also be requested to communicate to this House the report of the tour of inspection made during the past season, under direction of General Grant, through the Territories of Dakota, Montana, and Idaho to the Pacific coast.

2. The reasons in the case of each officer so removed.
3. The names of all new appointees.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will modify this resolution by adding these words:

And whether in any case, where the salaries of postmasters have not been increased, clerks have been allowed increased salaries; and if so, how many, and what amount in each case and in the aggregate.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] a further modification of his resolution, so as to provide that the inquiry be carried back to the 1st of last January. A number of removals which occurred before the adjournment of Congress ought, I think, to be inquired about.

Mr. DRIGGS. I think they have been the smartest on the home-stretch. [Laughter.] My resolution is sufficiently comprehensive.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

The SPEAKER stated the next proposition lying over to be the following one, submitted by Mr. MYERS:

Whereas, under the Constitution of the United States, the President of the United States has power to appoint officers of the United States, whose appointments are established by law, only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except temporarily to fill up vacancies that may happen in the recess of the Senate; and whereas the present Chief Magistrate, it is alleged, has, in numerous instances, failed to nominate such officers to the Senate for such advice and consent until its session had nearly closed, and then after rejection, reappointed them or designated others in their places, thus virtually exercising the sole power of appointment; and whereas in numerous other instances he has, it is alleged, appointed men to office and allowed a session of the Senate to elapse without sending in their names for confirmation; and whereas he has also, it is alleged, in numerous instances, during the recess of the Senate, made appointments to office where no vacancies had happened or existed:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House as early a day as possible,

1. The names of all persons reappointed by him after rejection by the Senate, or the names of others appointed in their stead, with a designation of the offices to which they were so appointed and the dates of their several appointments, and of their nominations to the Senate.

2. A like list and designation of all persons appointed by him whose names were withheld from the Senate during its sessions.

3. A like list and designation of all appointments made by him during the recess of the Senate where no vacancy had happened, and if to fill vacancies, then a complete statement of how such vacancies occurred.

This resolution being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD GRANTS IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER stated as the next business in order the consideration of a bill which was ordered to lie on the Speaker's table on the 26th of June, 1866, namely, Senate bill No. 320, to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of land to the State of Kansas, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said State," approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion of Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, it was ordered that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the next business in order is the consideration of House bill No. 830 introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] which was made the special order for to-day.

The bill was read. It provides, that the regular meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and each succeeding Congress thereafter, shall be at twelve o'clock meridian on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, and on the first Monday in January next thereafter, and on the second Monday in the November next preceding the end of the term for which the Congress is elected.

The second section provides that section seventeen of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled, "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," be so amended that no Senator or Representative in Congress, who may be a member of an immediately succeeding Congress, shall receive any allowance for mileage for traveling to the place of meeting to attend the first session of such succeeding Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose to ask the attention of the House long to this bill. I hope that the House will not deem it necessary to occupy much time in disposing of a matter requiring, on some accounts, immediate attention. If this bill, or anything like it in its main features, is to become a law, it is important that it should be enacted into law as speedily as possible in order to afford to some three or four States, which have not held their elections for members of the next Congress, and whose present election laws will not permit them to be represented in that Congress as early as the month of March, an opportunity, either by extra meeting or regular session of their Legislatures, of making the change.

The bill which I have presented provides in the first place, as its main object, for the assembling of each Congress hereafter on the 4th of March, being the first day of the term for which the members of such Congress are elected. The reason for that must be obvious to every one. We have now an executive department represented by the President as the Chief Magistrate, with that officer inaugurated on the very day upon which his term begins, to take the place of his immediate predecessor. Thus there is a continuity given to that which represents the executive power of this country. In the same way the judiciary is continuous by successive appointment of the members who compose our Supreme and other courts. But the legislative department has, up to this period of our history, presented a very different condition of things, the inconvenience of which now makes us feel for the first time, perhaps, that a reform is necessary. That inconvenience so presses upon us now that I have very little doubt every one must have come to the conclusion that a change is needed.

Congress is elected for a term of twenty-four months, and yet under the existing laws providing for the meeting of Congress a period of nine months, from March to December, must expire without any organization of the legislative department of the Government. It consists for more than one third of its time, therefore, of a number of persons elected to be Representatives of the legislative power of the country, but who are without power to meet together even for the purpose of organization, so that the powers of the Government with which they are to be invested cannot be exercised unless they shall be called together at the pleasure of the executive department. There is therefore in regard to the legislative department of the Government no permission to continue until we change the law. There is an interregnum extending over one third of the congressional term at each succeeding two years. I propose to cure this by providing that Congress shall hereafter, as the regular time of meeting, assemble on the first day on which the term of Congress commences. This meeting will ordinarily be, perhaps, for not much more except for organization. It is not likely that this first session of Congress provided for in the scheme which I propose will last much more than ten, twenty, or thirty days, depending upon the exigencies of the country, but it will give Congress an opportunity to organize by the election of a Speaker and the appointment of its officers and its committees so as to be prepared for business. It will enable them at their discretion to meet afterward at their own desire, and, in short, put them in a position to have, as it were, the command of the situation.

The bill provides for a meeting at that time, and the length of the session will depend upon the will of Congress itself. It does not seem to be necessary or proper to dispense with the other meetings of Congress as they now exist, although perhaps it may be, and I have so thought and provided in the bill, probably expedient to change the time of those present meetings. The Constitution requires that Congress shall meet at least once in each year. I have a provision for two other meetings, but for the sake of expediency and convenience I propose that the first session, as it now stands, which will then be the second session, instead of taking place on the first Monday in December, shall be thrown beyond the holidays, so as to get rid of a period of time in which not much business is ever done.

Some gentlemen have suggested to me that instead of throwing the meeting of Congress into January it would be better to bring forward the meeting of what is ordinarily the long session to November, and thus enable Congress to transact its business and adjourn before the dog-days of the following summer. I am willing to submit that question to the House, and therefore I leave it open that an amendment to that effect may be offered and the sense of the House taken upon it.

So far as the third session, now the second, or short session, is concerned, I have thought it expedient to bring it forward to the second Monday in November. The fixing it at that date will avoid any interference with the present time of holding elections in twelve or fourteen States. I propose to fix the second Monday of November as the day for the commencement of that session. Some gentlemen say that will interfere with the New York election. I think not. I think the election in that State is held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November. I have considered that point, and if I am right this bill cannot by any possibility interfere with the election. For that reason I took the second Monday instead of the first Monday. I think it exceedingly probable that either the present or some future Congress may change altogether the time for the election of members of Congress in the different States, so as to have uniformity in all the States by requiring the elections to take place everywhere at the same day; but that is a matter for future consideration. At present we have no uniformity in the day of election. I have conformed this bill to the rule in the greater number of States, whose elections do not come off until November.

There are, as I said at the outset, some three or four States which do not elect their members until after the term when the Congress for which they are elected commences. We should reform that by passing a bill of this kind. It has always seemed to me that it is a very anomalous condition of things that members should be elected to a Congress and should receive pay for a period antecedent to the time when elected. I hold that under all the circumstances the election should take place prior to the time when the term commences.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would suggest to my colleague, with his permission, that he make provision that, when the 4th of March occurs on a Sunday, Congress shall meet upon the following day.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would prefer that my colleague should make that motion, and I will leave it to the sense of the House.

I believe I need not add anything in further support of the view which I take of the necessity of some such legislation as this. Every one can see that if Congress had met on the 4th day of March, 1865, in all human probability, considering the then temper of the President of the United States, we should have been saved from that disagreement between himself and Congress which has led to our present difficulties. I venture to give it as my opinion, that if this Congress had been convened on the 4th of March, 1865, every State that had been in rebellion, accepting gladly the same terms which we offer them now, or terms very much more severe than those, would have been submissively obedient to the requirements made of them, and would now be represented upon this floor. Nay, if one were permitted to speculate upon the possibilities of the past, it is not at all certain but the then Vice President of the United States, considering the exhibition made by him upon the 4th of March, would have been so dealt with by Congress, after its assembling, that we would not have been troubled with any consideration of the questions now before us.

Passing from the first section, it will be seen that the second section is simply a provision to prevent constructive mileage. It amends the law in regard to mileage, or rather adapts this proposed new condition of things to the law as it exists, so that mileage shall not be charged for going home and returning on the 4th of March, in the cases of those who are reelected to this House, or who being Senators hold over as members of the succeeding Congress, and who, sitting in their places, make no other transit than from one Congress to another. I think nobody will except to that.

With these remarks, not supposing that a protracted debate will be necessary, and yet not desiring to call the previous question, so as to prevent the offering of amendments, I will now yield to such amendments as my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] and others may desire to offer.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the first section of this bill, by inserting after the words "on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected," the following words:

Except when the 4th day of March occurs on Sunday, in which case the Congress shall assemble on the next succeeding day.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] whether we ought not to allow this act to conform to the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution knows nothing of a 4th of March occurring on a Sunday. This bill is now precisely what the Constitution is. If the Constitution had made any provision for a 4th of March occurring on a Sunday, it might be well to have this bill amended accordingly; but it does not.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is nothing in the Constitution which, by implication or otherwise, ever did provide for the meeting of the Congress of the United States on a Sunday. The provision of the Constitution in relation to the times of meeting of Congress is as follows:

"The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

The House will take notice that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is quite mistaken in supposing that the Constitution takes no notice of and ignores Sunday. In the provision which I have just read the House will perceive that provision is made for Congress to meet on the first Monday in December. This very text of the Constitution, naming a day of the week other than Sunday, affords an example which I respectfully ask this House to follow. If the framers had ignored Sunday as a Christian institution, instead of providing for the assembling of Congress on the first Monday of December, they would have provided for the first or other day of the month, careless whether it should occur on Sunday or any other day of the week.

And I beg leave, further, to say in this connection, that one of the first men of this country, Chancellor Kent, of New York, was pleased to remind the people of the United States that Christianity was part of the law of the land. That Christianity, in other words, was recognized in your Constitution and laws; and I do not believe there is any sort of propriety or any kind of necessity for providing in terms by law, or announcing in advance, as has been said here, that it is our intention that the Congress of the United States shall be authorized or required by law to assemble and organize on Sunday.

In this connection, I will call the attention of the House to a further provision of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law."

Thus the Constitution on its very face recognizes Sunday as a day not to be counted in the days for the performance of the secular duties imposed by the Constitution, and this exception in the text is doubtless made for the very reason that the framers of the Constitution were not unmindful of the words of the Congress of 1776, employed in the Declaration, in which it was declared that "a decent respect" ought to be had "for the opinions of mankind." I therefore insist on my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM, it was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out in the seventh and eighth lines of the first section the words, "and on the first Monday in January next thereafter." These words provide for a meeting of Congress one month later than the time for the annual assembling of Congress, as now fixed. In my judgment, the effect of this would be merely to swap off a winter month for a month in the dog-days of summer. If this is to be the effect, I am opposed to it. The practice with most of us is to break up housekeeping at our homes for the entire winter, and we are quite as ready to come here on the first Monday of December as on the first Monday in January. I think, therefore, that this clause, instead of being an improvement to the bill, or upon our present practice, is an unwelcome feature which should not be adopted by the House.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to suggest to the gentleman whether his object will not be best accomplished by simply striking out "January" and inserting "December." The Constitution provides that the regular time for the meeting of Congress shall be the first Monday in December, unless some other time be designated by law. As this bill fixes the 4th of March as the regular time for the meeting of Congress, there will be no meeting on the first Monday in December, unless the bill so specify.

Mr. MORRILL. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], and modify my amendment so as simply to strike out the word "January" and insert in lieu thereof the word "December."

Mr. Speaker, the fact that the Christmas holidays occur during the first part of the congressional session, it appears to me is no great disadvantage. The early part of every session is occupied more or less by the work of the committees; and whether the House is in session or not the committees are at work. Certainly that has been my experience. I think, as I have already remarked, that the evident effect of fixing the first Monday of January for the meeting of Congress would be to extend our labors still later than at present into the hot season of the year. We should exchange the not undesirable month of December in Washington for the month of August, the worst of the whole season. Hence I am opposed to any such proposition and hope it will be rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will, as I understand, leave the time for the meeting of Congress precisely the same as it is at present.

Mr. MORRILL. It will as to one session.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by striking out the word "November" in the eighth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "December."

The SPEAKER. That is not germane to the pending amendment. It can be offered as a separate proposition after this is disposed of.

Mr. STEVENS. If it be in order, I move as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, to strike out after the word "elected" in the seventh line to the end of the section, the following words:

And on the first Monday in January next thereafter, and on the second Monday in the November next preceding the end of the term for which the Congress is elected.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Vermont is to strike out and insert. A motion to amend the amendment must be confined strictly to the part proposed to be stricken out. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will have to be reserved.

Mr. STEVENS. My object is simply to provide for a meeting of Congress on the 4th of March, and to leave everything else as it is at present.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman would have no other time fixed by law for the meeting of Congress?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir. I would have the Congress meet on the 4th of March, and leave it with them to decide how long they should sit, and to what time they should adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will regard the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] as coming prior to the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, which will be considered as an amendment designed to perfect the text before action on the motion to strike out the whole clause.

Mr. STEVENS. The Constitution now fixes the first Monday of December for a meeting of Congress, and we need not make any provision on that subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the leave of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I wish to call his attention to a possible difficulty that may arise under his proposition. He proposes to strike out any provision for a second session, and depend upon each Congress to fix a time for an adjourned meeting. Now, Congress may take a "recess," though there is a little doubt what that may be; but there cannot be a regular meeting of Congress except on the first Monday of December, unless some other time be fixed by law. It is a question between an adjourned meeting and a recess, if any one can draw the precise distinction.

But the precedents are these, as I find on consulting the record: that the First Congress, sitting solely so as to make it expedient not to meet on the first Monday of December, passed a short enactment going through all the forms of a regular act of Congress, and approved by the President, changing the time by putting it January instead of December. And there are four or five other cases in which the early Congresses, beginning with the practice established by the first, seem to have interpreted the Constitution by passing enactments and not resolutions for this purpose, so as to claim that their power to make an adjourned meeting—to make a meeting of Congress other than that provided in the Constitution—must be done, as the Constitution itself requires, by law.

The language of the Constitution, I presume, every one is familiar with. Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day. I propose to get rid of all questions hereafter as to whether it is a recess or an adjournment, whether it is a regular meeting, a meeting in continuation of the same session, or whether it is one of the regular meetings of Congress under the Constitution, by fixing it by law. Congress which meets on the 4th of March, or either of these other times, may take a recess, and that is the only way they can accomplish a meeting between any two regular sessions unless by law, by enactment under all the forms of a statute.

I suggest that as a difficulty you escape in drawing the bill as mine has been drawn. I repeat that in four or five cases where the first and two or three successive Congresses acted on this subject, and changed the time fixed in the Constitution, they did it by enactment under all the forms of law.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out "the second Monday in November" and insert "the first Monday in December." If my amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] be adopted it will leave the subsequent sessions of Congress as they are now, only providing by law for extra sessions every two years to commence on the 4th of March. I think that will be better. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] does not accomplish it for the reason that this section provides the regular time of meeting of the Fortieth Congress and each successive Congress. If you strike out that part you will only provide for one session of Congress.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The pending amendment is that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I rose to move an amendment in relation to one matter, providing for elections in States which do not hold elections before the 4th of March.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert after the word "thereafter," in the sixth line, "in addition to the present day of meeting," so that the 4th of March will be fixed as a new day in addition to the present day.

The SPEAKER. That will be reserved until the other motions are voted on.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer an amendment further to perfect, and it is to strike out in line seven from the word "elected" to and including the word "thereafter" in the eighth line, "and on the first Monday in January next thereafter," the same proposition offered by the gentleman from Vermont, a few moments ago; and it seems to me the section can stand precisely as printed, if these words be stricken out, and achieve the object we desire.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not in order except by unanimous consent, as the power of amendment has been exhausted.

No objection was made, and the amendment was received.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish simply to say, if my amendment prevail and the text be allowed to stand as it is now printed, two things will be done: first, we shall have provided by law that Congress shall meet one year on the 4th of March and the next year on the second Monday of November. That will cover the beginning of each Congress and satisfy the condition of the Constitution that Congress shall meet at least once in each year. It will make the first meeting, on the 4th day of March, to be continued as long or as short a time as the Congress may itself determine, with the power to adjourn to meet in the following November, or to meet in December or in January of the following year, if it pleases. But there must be a meeting, according to this bill, in the second year on the second Monday of November.

Now, I do not think we ought to determine here that there shall be three sessions of each Congress—two the first year and one the second; but let us declare by law that there shall be one meeting in each year, namely, the first, beginning on the 4th of March, and the second beginning, as provided here, in November, so that the last session of Congress shall be a four months' instead of a three months' session. The first session may be as short or as long as the Congress may determine. I therefore propose, in order to effect what I have just stated, to strike out all after the word "elected" in line seven to and including the word "thereafter" in line eight, so that it will read:

That the regular times of meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, shall be at twelve o'clock meridian on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, and on the second Monday in the November next preceding the end of the term for which the Congress is elected.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to make a motion to perfect the text.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope there will be no more amendments offered until we dispose of the present ones.

The SPEAKER. The first proposition is to strike out "the first Monday in January," and insert "the first Monday in December."

Mr. STEVENS. If I may be indulged, I will state that if my amendment to strike out all after the word "elected" prevails, I shall then move to modify the section so that it shall read thus:

That in addition to the regular time of meeting of Congress as now fixed, there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected.

We thus leave the matter as the Constitution fixes it, but we make a new meeting of Congress on the 4th of March according to this bill. That is what I want to get at. I am opposed to meeting before or after the beginning of December. My object is simply to confine the bill to another session on the 4th of March.

Mr. MORRILL. Why may we not legislate precisely as we think the exigencies of the country require? In the first place, this bill provides for the assembling of the next Congress, and of all succeeding Congresses, on the 4th day of March. I believe we all agree to that. Then the next meeting of Congress, unless there shall be circumstances requiring a different time, will be on the first Monday of December, as now. I think about that we are all substantially agreed. But it is known that the last session of Congress, as we have experienced in years past, is altogether too brief for the amount of labor which we are to perform. Therefore the bill which provides for an earlier meeting by about a month appears to be wise.

Now, if the amendment which I have proposed shall be adopted, we shall have one meeting of Congress on the 4th of March, which will be undoubtedly a brief one—will last for a week or ten days, or possibly longer—and then the next will occur, as now, on the first Monday of December, and the last session will occur a month earlier than December. It seems to me that is exactly what we are all after. I trust we shall incorporate it into a law so that it will be seen and read of all men.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman propose that the second session shall commence in November?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir, the last session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That may be very convenient for the gentleman from Vermont and those who have their elections in October, but it is not so convenient for those who have their elections in November.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe that the time fixed by the bill is six days after all the elections take place. It is the second Monday in November. For one, I should prefer to have them both in December, if there is any difference of opinion, but the amendment which I propose simply changes the bill as to the second session. If the gentleman from Illinois or others prefer to have the third or last session of Congress as now, they can move that amendment afterward.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that will be done, and I now demand the previous question on the pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MORRILL's amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment, and being put, there were—ayes ninety-two, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. STEVENS's motion.

Mr. STEVENS. With a view of reaching what seems to be the opinion of the House, I propose to modify the amendment so as to strike out the whole section and insert a new section, which has been drawn with some care. It is this:

That in addition to the present regular time for the meeting of Congress, there shall be a meeting of the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and of each succeeding Congress thereafter, on the 4th day of March, the day on which the term begins for which the Congress is elected, except that when the 4th of March comes upon a Sunday the said meeting shall be upon the next succeeding day.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a statement on this subject.

No objection was made.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not intend to make an argument upon this subject. I wish, however, to make some inquiries. We upon this side of the House are somewhat at a loss to know the particular object of this bill. We have an idea, however, that the President stands in the way of some gentlemen here. We are not fully advised, and I do not suppose that gentlemen opposite intend to advise us fully as to the object they have in making this change.

Mr. SCHENCK. May I reply to my colleague?

Mr. LE BLOND. Not at present.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand my colleague to ask a question, and I wish to answer it.

Mr. LE BLOND. I will answer it myself; I will play the Yankee.

Mr. SCHENCK. All I wished to say was that we have not found that either the President or his supporters have stood in our way at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. And my colleague might add with equal truth the Constitution. The conclusion that we upon this side have come to in regard to this matter is, that the whole object of this bill is to strip the Executive of any appointing power. They seem to have a controversy upon the other side of the House as to the best mode of accomplishing that object. The bill as originally introduced provides for three sessions of Congress. It is now proposed to strike that out and let the session commence upon the 4th of March and continue until the next session commences.

Well, sir, so far as these two propositions are concerned, I feel no particular interest in either of them, because the result of the adoption of either of them will be the same; but I judge that the country does feel an interest in this matter, and they are not willing that this Congress shall make any change in the present law so as to keep a perpetual session of Congress. It is unnecessary and uncalled for, and the expense that will attend it no man can calculate. The people at the proper time will feel these things, and I judge will act upon the matter in such a way as will not be very satisfactory to those who favor this system of legislation. And now all I desire is that gentlemen opposite will simply come out and make the thing plain, so that the people may understand it, and instead of legislating in the manner they do, say at once that we will have no Executive, but that we have merely a tenant at your will in the White House and with no appointing power, but that the Senate of the United States, so long as it shall remain radical, shall have the appointing power.

This is not the only bill looking to that end. There is already a proposition pending here, whereby the appointing power is proposed to be taken from the Executive and given to the Chief Justice of the United States. Now, I think it would be well enough, and I make the suggestion here, for the Secretary of the Interior to appoint the Chief Justice of the United States instead of the Chief Justice appointing certain officers in that Department of the Government.

Sir, I can see nothing but mischief to result from this system of legislation. If gentlemen are going to legislate in this way, I would much rather they should at once bring forward a bill to strike off the head of the Executive, for then the country would understand it. We upon this side of the Chamber have no interest in this contest, not the least, beyond sustaining the Constitution and free Government. The President is not the man of our choice; we did not put him where he is. We claim no benefits from him; certainly we received none from him in the late campaign. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. That is rather unjust.

Mr. SPALDING. You have dropped him.

Mr. LE BLOND. We have never dropped him, for we never took him up. There was no occasion for us to drop that which we never took up. We neither took him up, nor did he take us up. It is true that wherever he ran into our line of policy we were bound to sustain him, as we sustain every man who is right. But we have never blindly followed the lead of the President or any other man. The Democratic party has never recognized but one leader, and that is the Constitution, and laws passed in pursuance thereof. In this particular we widely differ from the gentlemen upon that side of the Hall. Their leader by the natural law must die, and that soon, while ours may live till the end of time if not strangled by its illegal guardians who are now trying by this and other bills to paralyze one of its most important limbs. But, sir, we have never undertaken to sustain indiscriminately that which the Radicals have put in place or power; to do so would destroy any party in the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to answer the inquiry put by the gentleman upon the other side, [Mr. LE BLOND.]

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. The principal difficulty under which the leader of the opposite side—

Mr. LE BLOND. Not at all; we have no leader.

Mr. SCHENCK. The principal difficulty under which he labors in regard to our purpose appears to be that we have not done something in such manner as to make it plain to the people. Now, sir, my observation teaches me to believe that the people do not need any particular explanation; but they have recently proved to the world that they fully understand the questions submitted to them by Congress. And I do not know that we can make this thing any plainer than they seem to have considered those other matters which they have passed upon.

I congratulate my colleague, [Mr. LE BLOND,] however, upon the fact that he will escape from all the difficulties in relation to this question under which those who come back to any succeeding Congress will labor; and he will also be relieved at the same time from all responsibility of presiding over that portion of the deliberations in this Hall which goes on on that side of the Chamber.

But he has another apprehension; that we find the President or something else an obstruction in the way of our legislation here, and are endeavoring to overcome or get around that obstacle. I say to my colleague, as I attempted to say a few minutes since when I interrupted him, that he is entirely mistaken upon that point. We have not, according to our recent experiences, found either the President, or those who support him, at all in the way of a determination of the decisions of the Congress of the United States.

Now, what is the gentleman's objection? It is that we create a session of Congress which will continue until the subsequent session of Congress begins. Sir, there is no such provision in this bill. The gentleman certainly has not read it aright, nor does he comprehend the amendment which is proposed to it. It simply provides that in addition to the sessions of Congress prescribed by the Constitution, there shall be another session to begin on the 4th of March, the day on which the term of the Congress itself begins. As to the length of time that session shall last, both the bill and the amendment are equally silent. I suppose the session will continue until Congress shall choose to adjourn. That is the most either he or any one else can make of it. I hardly suppose the gentleman wishes us to attempt any legislation which will prevent Congress from adjourning just when it pleases, either at the end of the first, second, or third session of that body.

Now, the gentleman need not be at all afraid that this is done for the purpose of "taking up" the President, as he expresses it, or "taking up" anybody else; or that we are going to interfere with any relations between him and his colleagues around him, and the President. I do not believe they took him up or he took them up. I do not believe it was a "taking up" at all; but that each took the other in and not up. Then finding that it was a mutual delusion, they are now ready to separate and dissolve the partnership.

There is no object, Mr. Speaker, in all this legislation except what appears upon its face; there is no "cat under the meal." We propose Congress shall continue as one of the coordinate branches of this Government, under such circumstances that there shall be no danger in any shape to the country by reason of an interregnum which shall leave suspended the functions of the legislative department during one third or any other portion of a congressional term. This is the whole of it. If, in addition to this legislation, we choose to proceed to other measures, to which the gentleman has alluded, but which are not in question now—if we take means to hedge round the President, and prevent some of that mischief in which he is now engaged—we shall perform a very laudable work; a work which I trust will go on until we have done all in that direction that may be possible or desirable.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, it was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section, to come in after section one:

And be it further enacted, That in each State which is represented in Congress at the time of the taking effect of this act, and which shall not, prior to the 4th of March, A. D. 1867, have elected Representatives from such State to the Fortieth Congress, nor have by law provided for such election prior to that day, the Governor of such State shall, by proclamation made at least two weeks before the 22d of February, A. D. 1867, order an election of such Representatives for such State to be held on said last-named day, such elections to be conducted in all respects according to the laws of said States regulating such elections.

I desire to make a suggestion or two in regard to this amendment, which has been shown, I believe, to the members of all or most of the States interested in it, and is substantially satisfactory to them. It provides for elections to be held on the 22d of February in each of the States which shall not have elected prior to the 4th of March next, or which shall not by their own laws have made provision for such election prior to that time.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion? It occurs to me that it may be beyond our power to command the Governor of a State to issue a proclamation as proposed in the amendment.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That may be true in the sense intended by the gentleman. But I presume it is competent for Congress, using the official appellation of the individual as a mere descriptive personae, to designate a Governor or other person as its minister or agent to make a proclamation. The Constitution, after providing that the Legislatures of the several States may, in the absence of congressional enactment, regulate the "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives," provides "that Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." My amendment simply proposes that Congress shall exert this power conferred upon it by the Constitution; and for the purposes of this exigency alone, confining the provision to that, it provides a method by which elections may be held in each of the States whose laws do not provide for an election before the 4th of March. I trust that the amendment will be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I do not rise to oppose this amendment. I think it, or something equivalent to it, is necessary. I have prepared a bill, which is now before the Committee of Elections, to fix a uniform time throughout the United States for the election of Representatives in Congress. I suggest that the gentleman's amendment might be improved by omitting all that machinery in reference to proclamations, and simply providing that in the States indicated in the amendment the 22d day of February or some other day shall be fixed for electing members to the Fortieth Congress, in conformity to the laws of those States. The purpose of the gentleman's amendment ought to be carried out; and perhaps its form is better than any I could suggest; but my proposition is designed to obviate a possible difficulty, where a Governor might neglect or refuse to issue a proclamation.

Mr. HIGBY. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has concluded, I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I do so with pleasure.

Mr. HIGBY. I conceive, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio would operate most disastrously with reference to the State of California, on account of the season of the year fixed for the election and the peculiar condition of our country at that season. My present judgment is that our State had better be left without any representation in Congress at the session beginning on the 4th of March, rather than that we should be required to hold an election at a season so unfavorable for the purpose. There is a very large portion of the population of our State living in remote districts, who are almost buried under the snow during the months of December, January, February, and March—so much so that in the towns in the mountains they have to burrow under the snow to cut a way from street to street.

I am, sir, stating what is the fact. The snow is twelve, fifteen, and twenty feet deep; and when we get below the snow belt, that is, in the mountain regions, we have winters when it is almost impossible for a month or six weeks for the people to get from town to town. It is, therefore, going to depend altogether upon the character of the season whether we can get our population to the polls or not. It will be impossible, if we have a winter such as we had in 1861 and 1862, for one quarter of the voters to get to the vicinity of the polls to vote. There were days and weeks when we had no intercourse between our towns during that winter. It was the same in 1862 and 1863. It is not so every winter. I am providing against this wet season which we have from time to time. It is my judgment that the bill should contain an alternative providing that the election can be held.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what my colleague has said; but I will add there are other objections which may be urged to having the provisions of this bill applied to California. It is not so easy to hold elections in our State, with its immense territory and a sparse population in many portions of it. It costs something to hold an election in the State of California, and then, in order to have a fair election, it is necessary that the same expensive machinery shall be put into operation to hold a congressional election as to hold an entire State election. The State of California postpones the election of Congressmen until the general State election in next September. Then we elect all our State officers, from Governor to members of the Legislature, and members of Congress. We can hold an election then that will call forth the sentiment and be a fair election in the State of California; but if we attempt to hold a special election in the month of February, when it is almost impossible to travel, sometimes entirely so, from one portion of our State to another, at a time when great frauds may be committed in elections, it would hardly be an indication of the sentiment of our State.

I hope, therefore, this bill will be postponed so we can have further time to perfect it, so as not to make it necessary that an election should be held in the month of February, and to see whether we cannot make an exception in the case of the State of California, at least not to make it mandatory or binding on us to attempt to accomplish what would be impossible, a physical impossibility.

Mr. SHELLABARGER obtained the floor. Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to suggest a modification. I still think it were better if the gentleman from Ohio would postpone this provision until the consideration of the bill pending in the Committee of Elections. If this bill now before the House become a law without that provision, some section in the other bill might meet this exigency if carefully prepared. I have therefore stricken out and inserted, at his suggestion, so that it will read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That in each State which is represented in Congress at the time of the taking effect of this act, and which shall not, prior to the 4th of March, A. D. 1867, have elected Representatives from such State to the Fortieth Congress, nor have provided for such election prior to that day, the second Tuesday of February next shall be the time fixed for the holding of such election in such State or States, such election to be conducted in all respects according to the laws of said States regulating said elections.

I think that will accomplish just what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] is after. Still, I suggest whether, after all, it would not be better to leave this matter without action. It is very apparent that this will create a sudden emergency in all the States to which it applies. It is all to transpire between now and the 4th of March, less than three months; and to precipitate upon States that have made no preparation and no calculation for an election, especially the State of California, the necessity of holding an election, it seems to me, would be unfortunate.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly obvious from the temper of the House and the indications we have had, that a bill is to pass this body which is to provide for the meeting of the first session of the Fortieth Congress on the 4th day of March. That fact being known, we may as well consider the propriety of this amendment from that standpoint.

This question, then, of the inconvenience of holding these elections so soon as February, comes to just this: the choice between being represented in the Fortieth Congress or holding an election between now and the 4th of March. The gentlemen from California, therefore, will see that their State will either not be represented in the first session of Congress, or else they must hold their election before the 4th of March next. Now, in the amendment which I have proposed I have postponed that election until within a week of the 4th of March, certainly not allowing more time than will be absolutely requisite to get the necessary returns.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not deem it meet or comely for this Congress to provide for the holding of a session of the Fortieth Congress without at the same time making provision by which all the States might at least be represented in Congress which are now recognized as entitled to representation. Let Congress at least do its duty in the way of providing a method by which the States may be represented. If the State of California or any other State, either on account of its snows or other circumstances, may not choose to avail itself of the methods provided by the act of Congress, that will be a matter which will concern the State itself. But I entreat this Congress, sitting as we now do, unfortunately and sadly deprived by the rebellion of some States of their wonted presence here, let us not pass a law providing for a meeting of the next Congress without providing a method by which the six States that have yet to hold their elections may be represented here, when the fact is that we can do so. The Constitution provides that another time for the meeting of Congress may be fixed by law. We are now passing a bill containing such a provision. Therefore let us make it possible that each State may be represented here. The question of convenience or inconvenience is one that does not seriously affect the propriety of passing this amendment.

My friend, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES,] suggests that we leave it for the purpose of being adjusted in a bill that that committee has under consideration. Now, I agree with that gentlemen entirely, provided we are sure that that bill will pass. I have preferred that method, and prefer it still. I have favored the bill he proposes, and still favor it. But that may not become a law, and hence I want this amendment to go on the statute-book along with this law, so that it shall not be said that Congress did not provide that six States should be represented here at the first session of the next Congress.

Now, after what I have said, if the members from the States that are interested prefer to run the risk of taking my colleague's bill without having this provision put in the law, I will withdraw my amendment. But I thought it was agreeable to the members from the States for whose benefit it was offered.

I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not withdraw his amendment. The bill that is now before the House, if matured into a law, puts to great inconvenience all those States that have not held congressional elections, by precipitating upon them an election at an unusual and unexpected time. That inconvenience should, therefore, be made as little as possible. In order to do that it is important that this bill be matured into a law at the earliest practicable moment, and that in it there shall be a provision for holding elections in those States which have not already chosen members of Congress. Hence the importance of this amendment being attached to the bill is that as soon as this is published to the country, as a part of the law of the land, the country will know at the same time when elections must be held in the several States for members of the next Congress, and take measures accordingly.

I am aware that it will be a matter of inconvenience to many gentlemen here who might desire to attend the elections, and who might probably be desired by their constituents to become candidates for reelection. That, of course, every one perceives, but that is an inconvenience which we must submit to. If this bill passes there will be the still greater inconvenience on the part of the Representatives of some of the States of not being present at the commencement of the next Congress to take part in its organization and to find appropriate places on its committees, to say nothing of the drawing of seats. I happen to have felt this inconvenience in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, which was called in extraordinary session, and I have no desire that any successor of mine shall be subjected to the same inconvenience.

I trust, therefore, that this bill will pass at as early a moment as practicable, and that this provision, or something tantamount to it, will be a part of the bill, so that when the bill goes before the country it will fix the time when elections are to be held for the next Congress.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I yield now to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me to suggest a mode of compromising this whole difficulty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me first suggest an objection to the bill, and then I will yield.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the object sought to be attained by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] and I understand that my delegation are in favor of that object. We think it a meritorious bill, and that the object is one necessary to be provided for; but I am fearful that some complication, especially for Connecticut, will arise out of the operation of the gentleman's amendment, if it becomes a law, that he has not contemplated, and it is one that it seems to me it is impossible to get rid of by any amendment proposed in so hasty a manner.

This bill, which seems likely to pass this Congress, or at any rate this House, provides that the next Congress shall meet upon the 4th of March next. If it does pass, Congress will then meet with four States, and perhaps five States, unrepresented here that are now represented, and one of those States is Connecticut. I am, and the Connecticut delegation are, clearly of the opinion that the House ought to provide that when Congress assembles, in some way Connecticut should be represented by an election held prior to that time.

But the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, as I understand it from the mere reading at the Clerk's desk, provides that the election of Representatives from Connecticut shall be held on the 22d day of February, under the laws of the State; and that unless the Legislature shall provide for an election on that day, the Governor by proclamation shall so provide. Our election is held now on the first Monday in April, and this amendment provides that it shall be held on the 22d of February. The registration law of our State, a most salutary and wholesome law, which has commended itself in its results to the people of the State, provides by its machinery that no man in the State shall vote except his name was registered upon certain days; and one of those days is the Wednesday prior to the first Monday in April, and hence if this bill passes and you provide that the election shall take place in Connecticut on the 22d of February, under the laws of the State no human being can vote at that election.

Mr. THAYER. Why not alter the law of the State?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That would require the Governor to call the Legislature together, because the Legislature does not meet until the first Monday in April. If the Legislature were to meet before that time, there would be no necessity for this legislation by Congress. That is the difficulty in the case of Connecticut, and there may be other States similarly situated. While we are heart and hand with him, and thank the gentleman for bringing the subject to the attention of Congress and the country, yet it will produce a confusion there which will result either in no election at all, or in so many systems of voting that the Committee of Elections of the next Congress will have nothing to do but to determine contested-election cases from the State of Connecticut.

I would, therefore, suggest that a measure which will operate upon the detailed machinery of the elections in the different States, covering the whole country, is not one to be brought forward here upon a penciled amendment, after a five minutes' consultation, and adopted upon the ground merely that if it is not passed now it may not be passed at all. I prefer that the mischief should be remedied upon this bill, rather than trust to the uncertain chances of another bill which has not been as yet even reported, and which, if reported, may not pass here, or if passed here may not pass elsewhere, or which if passed elsewhere may meet a veto. I prefer that it should be considered in connection with this bill; but as it is a subject of great importance, one that should be carefully considered, I suggest that this bill be postponed for a time, in order to allow a provision to be properly prepared.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to make this statement in reply to the very pertinent suggestions of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE.] I admit the practical difficulties to which he has alluded. And an amendment is now being prepared which, I trust, will meet those difficulties. That amendment, in substance, will provide that the elections shall be held on the day named, and that the laws of the State shall be pursued in so far as in their nature they are capable of being pursued; or something of that general idea substituted for the amendment now pending.

Now, my own opinion is, and I suggest it to my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that the proper way now would be to postpone this bill for a short time, and he can consider the suggestions made by gentlemen from States interested, and prepare a bill which shall be as near perfect in every respect as possible. I now yield to the gentleman from California, [Mr. BIDWELL.]

Mr. BIDWELL. I agree entirely in the object sought to be accomplished by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] But I can perceive this difficulty, that it will be impossible to hold upon the day he has named a fair election in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. A large proportion of the population of the State of California is composed of miners, who are during the summer months in the mountains; but who during the winter months are obliged to retire to the valleys. It would, therefore, be impossible to hold a fair election in the winter season, especially should the winter be inclement, as it often is in the mountainous regions of our State.

And further, if the amendment as proposed, and which is mandatory, should be adopted, and the States are obliged to hold their elections on the day therein specified or not at all, then the State of California would not be represented at all in the Fortieth Congress. Our elections are now held on the first Monday in September. If this amendment is adopted and we fail to elect in February, then we cannot be represented at all in the next Congress. Therefore I hope that the gentleman who is maturing an amendment to cover all these objections will take into consideration this fact, and provide that if the States fail to hold an election on the day named, they shall be permitted to elect at the times fixed by the statutes of their respective States.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I now yield a short time to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

Mr. HIGBY. Without repeating any of the arguments I used when I addressed the House before, I think I can show the utter impracticability of the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] yield to me to make a proposition?

Mr. HIGBY. I will with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] by whose courtesy I now hold the floor.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I have no objection.

Mr. ROLLINS. I would suggest that the House now adjourn, and let this subject come up again for consideration when we meet on Monday next. In the mean time the gentlemen representing the several States interested in this subject can consult together and prepare an amendment which will meet the objections which have been raised against this proposition. With that view I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly, (at five minutes before three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 10, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. J. W. PARKER, D. D., of Boston.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

Hon. WILLIAM SPRAGUE, of Rhode Island, and Hon. B. GRATZ BROWN, of Missouri, appeared in their seats.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE. I present the memorial of D. A. Moffit, and many other citizens of Colorado, praying for the admission of Colorado as a State. It sets forth a great many statistical facts that are officially certified. As the memorial is short and contains authentic information with regard to the number of inhabitants, the condition of the Territory, &c., I move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY presented the memorial of L. Pomeroy & Son, remonstrating against an extension of the letters-patent of Stephen R. Parkhurst, dated May 1, 1845; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the petition of Patrick Meehan, of Decatur, Indiana, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of officers in the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Rice and many other persons who served in the United States Navy during the late rebellion, praying to be allowed a bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of a large number of clerks in the Second Auditor's office of the Treasury Department, and also the petition of a large number of clerks in the Sixth Auditor's office of the Treasury Department, praying, in aid of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, that there be a reorganization of the Treasury Department, and for increased pay to the clerks in the Department; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented resolutions and other proceedings of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, adopted on the 6th instant, being a practical protest against the assumption of the Earl of Derby of the telegraphic dominion of Great Britain over the sea, and petitioning for immediate soundings by our Navy of other lines in the Atlantic bed between our coast and the western coast of France and southern Europe; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in relation to the records and other papers in the office of the clerk of the United States court for the southern district of Mississippi which have been lost or destroyed by fire; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented fourteen memorials of citizens of the United States, remonstrating against an increase of the tariff on foreign linseed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN. I also present a communication from Hon. Thomas Hillhouse, comptroller of the State of New York, reviewing with much care the effects of our present system of taxes and containing an argument in favor of providing for the payment of the war debt created by the several States, or giving to the States some particular source of revenue now under the control of the General Government to be appropriated and used by the States for that express object. I move that this communication, which although addressed to me assumes the form of a petition, be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer the memorial of William H. Harman, of Floyd county, Virginia, setting forth that some months ago he was assessed $1,012 upon whisky at his distillery in that county, and before he had time to remove it the distillery was burned, together with the whisky assessed, by which he sustained a very large loss. He asks Congress to relieve him from the payment of that tax, and grant him such other relief as the premises will justify. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of ribbon manufacturers, silk throwsters, dyers, dealers, and others, of New Jersey, praying for a specific tax on thrown silk and silk cloths of every description, or for an increase of the present rate of ad valorem tariff; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented the memorial of William Cornell Jewett, praying that Hannibal Hamlin be declared by Congress the constitutional President of the United States of America under the second section of the first article of the Constitution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the memorial of William Rogers Hopkins, formerly professor of mathematics in the Naval School, in which he sets forth his former relations to that school, and now makes recommendations with regard to a survey in the State of New York, with a view to opening a water communication between the Atlantic coast and the West. I do not know to what committee this memorial should be referred. If one of the western Senators will suggest to me—

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Commerce is suggested. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Commerce. It was so referred.

Mr. POLAND. I offer certain resolutions adopted by a convention of wool-growers held at Bellows Falls, Vermont, on the 12th of November, 1866, in favor of an increase of the duty on all importations of foreign wool, which I ask to have printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. Before those resolutions are received, I should like to ask the Senator whether they are in writing or merely taken from a newspaper? I merely ask the question with reference to the usage of the Senate.

Mr. POLAND. They are from the secretary of the convention.

Mr. SUMNER. In writing or in printed form?

Mr. POLAND. In writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the reading of the resolutions asked for?

Mr. POLAND. The resolutions are somewhat lengthy. I do not deem it necessary that they be read. I move that they be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That Selena Barclay have leave to withdraw her petition and papers (praying for compensation for losses sustained by her in the destruction of the Gosport navy-yard in April, 1861) from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union, reported it without amendment.

OFFICIAL TENURE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The joint select committee on retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report the bill back, with a recommendation of certain amendments, which being adopted the committee are of opinion that the bill ought to pass. I beg leave to say in connection with this report that we have reported this bill and these amendments regulating removals from office and appointments to office so far as concerns officers whose nominations require the confirmation of the Senate, and have adopted what appears to us to be a feasible scheme in that respect, in no spirit of hostility to any party or administration whatever, but in what we conceive to be the true republican interest of the country under all administrations, under the domination of all parties in the growth which is before us in the future; and in that spirit I shall ask the attention of the Senate to the bill when it comes to be considered. I move that the amendments be printed, and that the bill be made the special order for Thursday next, at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed with the bill under the rule. A motion in regard to the bill can be entertained only by unanimous consent, as no action can be had on a bill on the day it is reported except by unanimous consent. The Senator from Vermont moves that this bill be made the special order for Thursday next, at one o'clock in the afternoon. No objection being made to the motion, the Chair will put it to the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I shall object; I would as soon agree that this bill be made a special order as any other; but I wish to warn the Senate against embarrassing themselves at this early period of the session with special orders. They have been found heretofore exceedingly embarrassing. They generally interfere with each other, and I think effect nothing in the way of facilitating action upon any particular bill. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be as well for him to give notice that he will call it up on that day, and thus, I think, effect all his purpose without having these special orders entered, as there will be many of them on the Calendar. I shall not, of course, interpose any objection, but I rose merely to make the suggestion to my friend from Vermont in case he considers it favorably.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am quite willing to adopt the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Maine. I agree to the propriety of what he says, and as he has been here long enough to take the responsibility of initiating such a course of proceeding, I am quite willing to follow it, and to waive the motion that I have made, with the understanding that if I think it proper hereafter I shall insist upon the same objection, which I conceive myself is advantageous to the administration of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to fix Thursday next as the day for the special consideration of this bill is withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 460) in relation to persons imprisoned under sentence for offenses against the laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 461) to aid in the construction of the San Francisco Central Pacific railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

No. 464) in relation to the records and other papers in the office of the Clerk of the United States court for the southern district of Mississippi, which have been lost or destroyed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) amending the ninth section of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORT OF COLUMBIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be engraved the drawings accompanying the annual report of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and the Dumb; and he is also directed to print for the use of the institution one thousand additional copies of said report, inserting therein, as well as in the copies already printed, impressions of the drawings above ordered.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPHING.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Post Office Department to construct and operate telegraph lines along the principal mail routes, or such of them as it may deem necessary, or to contract with such lines as may be already established, if that shall be deemed more advisable, for the use and control of such lines, and in connection with its postal business to establish offices at such points as may be determined upon, open at all hours to the public and the press for safe and speedy transmission of dispatches under proper regulations and at fixed minimum rates; the committee to report by bill or otherwise.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate certain bills received from the House of Representatives just prior to the adjournment of the last session, which were laid upon the table and remained undisposed of at the adjournment.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 632) to authorize the building of a military and postal railroad from Washington, District of Columbia, to the city of New York—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 715) setting aside certain proceeds from internal revenue for the erection of penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota—to the Committee on Territories.

A bill (H. R. No. 793) to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 811) for the relief of certain drafted men—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 818) for the relief of Norman Ward—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 819) for the relief of Richard A. Vervalen, and others—to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

DIRECT TAX OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) to suspend temporarily the collection of the direct tax within the State of West Virginia, which had been returned from the House of Representatives at the close of the last session with an amendment, was taken from the table, and, with the amendment, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 279.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 279) for the relief of loyal citizens of Loudoun county, Virginia.

Mr. HOWE. I now move that it be recommended to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I gave notice last week, as the honorable Senator from Illinois may recollect, that to-day I would endeavor to call up the bill which has been so long before the Senate, for the extension of suffrage in this District. As the motion which the honorable Senator has now made will probably involve discussion, I hope he will allow me to go on with that bill at this time. I appeal to the Senator from Illinois to yield to me, and allow me to take up that bill, of which notice was given in the early part of last week.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill to which I have called attention is very short, and consists of but a few lines. There was manifested on the part of the Senate some days ago, when the motion was made to refer the bill, an anxiety to have it acted upon. The Judiciary Committee have since considered it and reported it back. I imagine that it is not a bill which will give rise to any very considerable discussion. I should presume not, though I do not know what may be the temper of the Senate. I do not wish to antagonize one bill with another; but this is the morning hour, and it is possible that the bill may be passed before the hour of one o'clock arrives.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has given notice that he intends to discuss it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If Senators are disposed to discuss the measure, we may as well hear their speeches now as at any other time. It is not by way of antagonizing it to any other bill that I move to take up this bill now, but because there was manifested on the part of the Senate last week a disposition to have early action upon it, and I considered it my duty, having charge of the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, to move to take it up at the earliest opportunity. I submit the matter to the Senate. If there is a disposition not to take it up, be it so; I shall have discharged my duty in reference to it. I leave it to the Senate to do as they think proper. I do not know but that we can consider both measures during the day. I certainly do not wish to be put in the position of antagonizing this bill against the one which the Senator from Maine has in charge.

Mr. MORRILL. If I am to understand that the Senator will be content to go on with his bill until one o'clock and will allow my bill to come up at that time, I certainly shall not object. While I disclaim any personal desire on the subject, this bill is so situated, and my own connection with it has been such, that I shall feel obliged to ask a decision of the Senate on the question of taking up the bill named by the Senator from Illinois, if it is insisted upon.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill which the Senator from Maine has in charge is entitled "No. 1" on the Calendar of the Senate. It is No. 1 in time, and I think it may also be called No. 1 in importance. I think we ought not to lose any opportunity to take that bill up and pass it. We ought not to allow any other measure to be interposed. Therefore, while I am very earnest for the proposition of my friend from Illinois, I must express the hope that he will allow it to be proceeded with after we have disposed of the other question, which has been so much longer on the Calendar of the Senate. Let us, so far as the Senate can do it, give suffrage to the colored race in the District on this day; let us signalize this first day of actual business by finishing that great act; and then during the remainder of the afternoon we can proceed with the bill of the Senator; but I hope that he will not press his bill to the exclusion of this other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 828?

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 380) to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 327) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharine F. Winslow.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE. I ask to have the bill just returned from the House with reference to pension agents taken up, with a view to refer the bill and the amendment of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the Senate the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, which has been returned from the House with an amendment.

Mr. LANE. I move to refer the bill and the amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary. There is simply a legal question raised by the amendment of the House, which I think should go to that committee instead of to the Pension Committee, although the subject-matter would seem to belong to the Pension Committee. The question raised is this: the House propose by their amendment that the pension agents appointed since the 1st of December shall not exercise the duties of their office until they shall be confirmed by the Senate. Under the present laws the Secretary of the Interior has a right to make those appointments. The question now is, whether, he having made the appointments under the existing law, the offices can be vacated by a law of Congress. I suppose that to be a proper question for the consideration of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why, Mr. President, that certainly is no question at all. There is no judicial question about that. As a question of power Congress may abolish the office of pension agent any day. It may abolish the whole of them, if it thinks proper, to-morrow. It is a mere question as to the propriety of the mode of appointing these officers. There can be no doubt that Congress has authority at any time to abolish any office which it has created by law. I apprehend that the bill had better remain with the Committee on Pensions, who have had charge of it heretofore.

Mr. LANE. I have no doubt now of the propriety of referring it to the Judiciary Committee, inasmuch as the learned chairman of that committee seems so perfectly confident with reference to that question. It is not a question as to whether Congress has the power to abolish pension agents or not, but it is a question whether the pension agents having been appointed legally, and they having entered upon the discharge of their duties, we may say that the offices shall then be vacated until further conditions are complied with. I think it does involve an important legal question, and I should like very much to have the light of the Judiciary Committee upon it, inasmuch as the Pension Committee have already reported the bill without such an amendment and adverse to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I of course cannot answer for the Judiciary Committee; I only speak for myself; but as a question of power, it seems to me there can be no doubt about it at all. If the Senator from Indiana has doubts he had better investigate it, for I really should not know how to enter upon the investigation of the question as to the power of Congress to limit the tenure of an office that has been created by law. I suppose that it manifestly has that authority. Whether it is proper to abolish the office of pension agents or to limit the tenure by which they hold them is another question, and one very proper for the Committee on Pensions, which has been considering this matter. It seems to me that is the proper place for this bill. However, sir, I shall enter into no controversy with the Senator about it. I suggest to him that the proper disposition of it is to refer it to the Committee on Pensions. If the Senator thinks proper to send it to the Judiciary Committee, as one member of the committee I certainly shall try and dispose of it as best we can. It is a matter, however, that that committee has not investigated at all. We have not been looking into the question of pensions, as to their mode of payment, or the appointment of the pension agents, as it, of course, would involve an investigation of questions not appropriately belonging to that committee.

Mr. LANE. The Senator from Illinois does not seem to take the distinction. This is not a proposition to abolish the office of pension agents, but it is simply this: pension agents who have been appointed under the existing law and have entered upon the discharge of their duties, by this amendment are not permitted to go on until they have been confirmed by the Senate. This will be a law passed altogether after they have entered on the discharge of their duties. It is not to abolish the office. The same agents are continued under it on the condition of confirmation; but they are not to continue if they are not confirmed, although they have been appointed under the existing law and their appointment is entirely legal up to this point. It is retrospective. Their appointment when made was legal. We purpose now to make it illegal by a subsequent act, retroactive in regard to a subject over which I fear we have no power. I wish to do all that the amendment contemplates, but I doubt very much whether we have the power to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on an amendment moved by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] to the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. The amendment reported by the committee and the amendment to that amendment will be read.

Mr. MORRILL. As the bill is not a long bill, and has not been read this session, I ask for the reading of the whole bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the original bill, which was introduced by Mr. WADE, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act.

each and every male person, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has not been convicted of any infamous crime or offense, and who is a citizen of the United States, and who shall have resided in the said District for the period of six months previous to any election therein, shall be entitled to the elective franchise, and shall be deemed an elector and entitled to vote at any election in said District, without any distinction on account of color or race.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person whose duty it shall be to receive votes at any election within the District of Columbia, who shall willfully refuse to receive or who shall willfully reject the vote of any person entitled to such right under this act, shall be liable to an action of tort by the person injured, and shall be liable, on indictment and conviction, if such act was done knowingly, to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year in the jail of said District, or to both.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall willfully interrupt or disturb any such elector in the exercise of such franchise he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not to exceed $1,000, or be imprisoned in the jail in said District for a period not to exceed thirty days, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the several courts having criminal jurisdiction in said District to give this act in special charge to the grand jury at the commencement of each term of the court.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Secretary next read the amendment reported by Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, which, as amended by the insertion of the words in italics, was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That, from and after the passage of this act, each and every male person, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has not been convicted of any infamous crime or offense, and excepting persons who may have voluntarily left the District of Columbia to avoid aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion, and who is a citizen of the United States, and who shall have resided in the said District for the period of six months previous to any election therein, shall be entitled to the elective franchise, and shall be deemed an elector and entitled to vote at any election in said District, without any distinction on account of color or race.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person whose duty it shall be to receive votes at any election within the District of Columbia, who shall willfully refuse to receive, or who shall willfully reject the vote of any person entitled to such right under this act, shall be liable to an action of tort by the person injured, and shall be liable, on indictment and conviction, if such act was done knowingly, to a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year in the jail of said District, or to both.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall willfully interrupt or disturb any such elector in the exercise of such franchise he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not to exceed $1,000, or be imprisoned in the jail in said District for a period not to exceed thirty days, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The Secretary next read the amendment of Mr. WILLEY, which was to strike out the first section of the committee's amendment, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That in all elections to be held hereafter in the District of Columbia the following described persons, and those only, shall have the right to vote, to wit:

First. All those persons who were actually residents of said District and qualified to vote therein at the elections held therein in the year 1865, under the statutes then in force.

Second. All persons, residents of said District, who have been duly mustered into the military or naval service of the United States during the late rebellion, and have been or shall hereafter be honorably discharged therefrom.

Third. Male citizens of the United States who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, (excepting paupers, persons non compos mentis, or convicted of an infamous offense,) and who, being residents of the ward or district in which they shall offer to vote, shall have resided in said District for the period of one year next preceding any election, and who shall have paid the taxes assessed against them, and who can read, and who can write their names.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the bill has been so long before the Senate that perhaps I shall be justified in stating to the Senate briefly what is proposed by the bill, its scope, and its provisions substantially, perhaps with some observations touching the principle which is involved in the bill itself. It had some consideration in opposition by the opponents of the bill at the last session, but I believe nothing has been said on the affirmative side in explanation or by way of argument.

It will be seen, sir, that the measure purports to be a measure to regulate the suffrage, the elective franchise in the District of Columbia. It is a little more than that. It not only regulates the elective franchise in this District, but it extends it and enlarges it. The principal feature perhaps of the bill, that which is of most interest to the Senate and to the country, and that which probably challenges the objection to the bill, is that it embraces the colored citizens of the District of Columbia. In this particular it is novel, and in this particular it is important. In this particular it may be said to be inaugurating a policy not only strictly for the District of Columbia, but in some sense for the country at large. In this respect it is, I suppose, that this bill has received so large a share of the public attention during the last session and the recess of the Congress of the United States.

If I were to define this bill in a single phrase, I should say that it is impartial restricted suffrage; that is to say, it proposes to be impartial among all the male citizens of the United States resident in this District. To that extent it is impartial. It is restricted in that it is confined to the male sex; and in that it is confined to persons of adult age; and in that it excludes paupers, insane persons, persons non compos mentis, and persons who have rendered themselves, by crime—treason, felony, or otherwise—infamous, and so not to be trusted in public affairs. Therefore, sir, as a definition, I say it is what may be called impartial restricted suffrage, as distinguished from universal and manhood suffrage, of which we hear so much in these days.

These principles are attempted to be enforced by appropriate provisions in the bill which make it really an election bill.

And now, Mr. President, with this general statement of the objects and scope and provisions of this bill I content myself; but I trust I shall be pardoned for making a single remark in regard to the position of this measure before the Congress of the United States, and possibly before the country.

It will be seen by the bill that it was introduced into the Senate on the first day of the last session of Congress. I believe a similar bill was introduced into the other branch of the Legislature on the same day, which came to the Senate, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and which was not reported upon to the Senate. This, perhaps, may be regarded as a substitute for it. Allow me to say, and I think I am called upon to say, owing to the public misapprehension on the subject, that bill the committee considered anomalous in its character. While it was a bill proposing legislation, in fact, it was simply a declaration of a principle with no provision whatever for its enforcement. Therefore in effect it gave no right whatever, and enlarged no privilege whatever. While it declared that the principle of "white," which was an exclusion, and which deprived the colored citizen of his right to vote was wrong, it had no provision to correct the evil; and so, Mr. President, the committee of this body (agreeing with the sentiment of that bill, that the principle of discrimination or exclusion in that case was wrong, and if it were wrong, it was the duty of Congress that declared it to be a wrong to provide the remedy) as that bill did not provide a remedy substituted this for it.

I feel called upon to make this statement on account of the misapprehension on this subject here and elsewhere. It seems to have gone out to the country that the other branch of Congress passed a suffrage bill which gave to the colored citizens the right of suffrage, and that somehow or other the Senate had not concurred with the House. It will be found upon examination that this bill is in harmony with the principle which was sought to be initiated in the House, but which failed of any effect at all for want of any provision in their bill to enforce it; and that, I submit, is a sufficient answer to any imputation or charge upon the Senate, that it had not acted in concurrence with the House of Representatives upon the suffrage bill. The House has sent us no such bill.

Mr. President, there has been a misapprehension in the public press of the country upon this subject which I feel authorized to refer to, and I take occasion to say, and I say it deliberately, that the misapprehension of the public press in regard to this subject is disreputable to American journalism. Sir, we publish the debates of this body accurately and with fidelity. There is no occasion for misapprehension and still less for misrepresentation of what is done in this body; and yet, since the last session of Congress began, on this subject the public press have not only misconceived and misapprehended, but misrepresented this question, to the public detriment, as I think. I do not stand here to complain. I have no personal grievance to speak of; but influential and leading presses of the country who have undertaken to speak most on this subject have misrepresented and misapprehended most, and the Congress of the United States, particularly this branch of it, has been put in the attitude of withholding action upon the question of suffrage in the District of Columbia when the record published to the country shows that the Senate has acted promptly on this question, and acted in harmony with what were understood to be the sentiments of the other branch.

Mr. President, with these remarks I proceed to notice some objections to this bill of a local character, and then I shall have occasion to advert to some of a more general character and to briefly state the principle on which this bill proceeds. Of course, in its most intimate relations, this bill is local. It affects the people of this District, and as you would expect, as it was reasonable to expect, those people have expressed their opinions to Congress upon the subject. Here is a communication from the mayor of the city of Washington, which perhaps I may as well send to the Clerk and ask him to read, which states the position of the corporation, the mayor and aldermen, and the electors of this District on that subject.

The Secretary read the following communication:

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C.,
MAYOR'S OFFICE, CITY HALL,
January 6, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor, in compliance with an act of the councils of this city, approved December 16, 1865, to transmit through you to the Senate of the United States the result of the election held on Thursday, 21st December, "to ascertain the opinion of the people of Washington on the question of negro suffrage," at which the vote was 6,626, segregated as follows:

Against negro suffrage.....	6,591
For negro suffrage.....	35

Majority against negro suffrage.....	6,556
--------------------------------------	-------

This vote, the largest with but two exceptions ever polled in this city, conclusively shows the unanimity of sentiment of the people of Washington in opposition to the extension of the right of suffrage to that class; and that its integrity may be properly appreciated by the Senate, I give the aggregate of the vote cast at the five elections immediately preceding for mayor:

1856.....	5,840
1858.....	6,813
1860.....	6,975
1862.....	4,816
1864.....	5,720

No others, in addition to this minority of thirty-five, are to be found in this community who favor the extension of the right of suffrage to the class and in the manner proposed, excepting those who have already memorialized the Senate in its favor, and who, with but little association, less sympathy, and no community of interest or affinity with the citizens of Washington, receive here from the General Government temporary employment, and having at the national capital a residence limited only to the duration of a presidential term claim and invariably exercise the elective franchise elsewhere.

The people of this city, claiming an independence of thought and the right to express it, have thus given a grave and deliberate utterance in an unaggravated way to their opinion and feeling on this subject.

This unparalleled unanimity of sentiment which pervades all classes of this community in opposition to the extension of the right of suffrage to that class engenders an earnest hope that Congress, in according to this expression of their wishes the respect and consideration they would as individual members yield to those whom they immediately represent, would abstain from the exercise of its absolute power, and so avert an impending future apparently so objectionable to those over whom, by the fundamental law of the land, they have "exclusive jurisdiction."

With much respect, I am, sir, your own and the Senate's obedient servant.

RICHARD WALLACH, Mayor.

Hon. L. F. S. FOSTER, President of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. It will be seen, Mr. President, that the mayor informs the Senate of the United States that the corporation of Washington has held an election on this question of the elective franchise, and that at that election the qualified electors, the persons who were qualified to vote in the ordinary affairs of the corporation, its prudential concerns, have voted on this question of popular rights, and the mayor is pleased to say that there was unparalleled unanimity in that vote; and from the certificate of the election it would seem to be so. It would seem that out of all the votes cast, some 6,500, more or less, were opposed to the extension of the elective franchise, while only 30 or 40 were in favor of it. This the mayor calls ascertaining the opinions of the people, and this he proclaims as an unparalleled expression of the people of this District in opposition to this bill!

Now, Mr. President, I do not desire to say anything harsh or severe on that subject, but the enthusiasm of his honor the mayor in making this announcement to the Senate, and his self-delusion in persuading himself that this election of the qualified electors is an expression of public opinion of the people of this District, allow me to say is only equaled by the ingenuity of the device by which the electors of this District qualified to vote in its prudential affairs seek to foreclose a question of popular rights by voting it done at the polls over which they have the exclusive control. Certainly, Mr. President, these six or seven thousand voters who are said to have made this expression are only one in thirty at most of the people of this District, and it is very difficult to understand how there could be more significance or probative force attached to these six or seven thousand votes than to an equal number of voices independent of the ballot, under the circumstances.

I dismiss, then, this objection with the single remark, let it go for what it is worth, they vote upon a subject over which they have no jurisdiction whatever and in polls over which they have the exclusive control, shutting out every body who does not think as they think. And I may be permitted to add that it is remarkable, nay, sir, it is astounding, that these people seem to learn nothing by current events. They do not seem to learn the lesson of submission to what is inevitable in our history and institutions.

But, Mr. President, my attention has been called to an objection of a more general character from another source. With the permission of the Senate I will send to the Clerk to be read an article which I take from one of the daily journals of this District, which was sent to me to attract my particular attention to the subject, understanding that this bill was to come before the Senate to-day, and comes to me marked so as to render the points noticeable. I ask that the Clerk read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, no objection being interposed.

The Secretary read as follows:

"NEGRO SUFFRAGE—CONGRESS SHOULD PAUSE.—We learn that Mr. MORRILL will, at an early day, call up the bill conferring the ballot upon the negroes of the District of Columbia.

We would admonish Mr. MORRILL not to be over hasty in his action, and we would suggest to Congress, as well as to all others who profess to be friends of the colored race, to pause, to weigh well their action, as the conferring of suffrage upon the blacks of this District would be to them a most evil thing. The people of Washington and Georgetown, many of them, are the descendants of proud, dignified, and haughty families, of men who could distinguish between black and white, of men who were not blinded by fanaticism, and who taught their children to read the Bible, in which, no doubt, they must have read the following: 'Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren.'

"The people of the District of Columbia, those of them who are sound-minded, and the majority of them are, cannot look with favor upon any action of Congress which would place them politically upon an equality with the descendants of Ham, with those who, by the fiat of Heaven, are destined not only to serve, but to be the servants of servants. The conferring of suffrage upon the blacks of the District would be the cause of their destruction. It would infuse into those benighted people, a people which, by nature, birth, and education, are unenlightened, a false idea of the possession of liberty, which would array them in deadly antagonism against the superior race, and the result would be damaging to the negroes. As a body, they are servants, dependants, and the probabilities are that employers would, in such an event, discontinue their services; and should they go to the polls to deposit their ballots, the probabilities are that they would not all return to their homes.

"For these, and other reasons, we conjure Congress not to be hasty in its action on this matter."

Mr. MORRILL. Here it will be seen an appeal is made to Congress not to make haste in conferring the elective franchise on the colored citizens of this District. Pause, it is said, because to do so will be an evil thing to the freedman. Why? It is said it will cause his destruction. How? That he will be frantic with his liberty, and become insurrectionary, seditious, in the phrase applied to him on another occasion when he was about to be emancipated, that he will become a vagrant and a vagabond, and abuse his liberty and the rights of other parties? No; nothing of that sort. How, then, would this work his destruction? Why, sir, we are told that a portion of the people of this District are descendants of a proud, dignified, haughty race of men; men who know the distinction between white and black, men who have read the Bible and who have inculcated the doctrine to their children that "cursed is Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be." They have inculcated to their children the doctrine that it is the fiat of Heaven that he shall be a servant of servants to the end of the world. Now, if Congress undertakes to repeal this fiat of Heaven, if Congress undertakes to grant a privilege and a right to the colored citizen which is against this doctrine, what then? Why, you offend the prejudices, and you mortify the pride, and you humiliate the arrogance of these people, and the result is—what? They have the command of the polls, and whenever by your authority these colored people come to the polls to deposit their votes, what is to be the result? Let us see:

"Should they go to the polls to deposit their ballots, the probabilities are that they would not all return to their homes."

So it is an evil thing to extend the right of suffrage, and by our misguided zeal we are in danger of working the destruction of the colored race. I think that is the logic. I think that is the inevitable inference of this paper.

Mr. WILSON. What paper is it that makes that threat?

Mr. MORRILL. I believe the title of the paper is not on this piece. I think it is printed or purports to be printed in Georgetown. It is the Times, printed in Georgetown. It is sent to me marked, the emphatic parts of it. I submit, if I am not wrong in the deductions which I make from this extraordinary article, that here in the capital of the nation is the spirit of insurrection and rebellion rife in another section of this country revived. Sir, the man who reasons thus of his duties of citizenship is an insurrectionist and should be bound over to keep the public peace against all men, no matter who he is; and the man who interprets the word of God in that way is an infidel, unchristian; he has denied the faith, and, no matter what may be his dignity or pride of family, he is the least in that kingdom of our Master, without regard to race or color.

Sir, it is not emancipation and it is not enfranchisement of this defenseless race which these people have occasion to dread; it is that spirit of slavery, that system of slavery which has eaten out the heart, tainted the blood of the descendants of these dignified, proud, haughty families to which reference is made here.

Mr. President, these are all the objections that have come to my knowledge that are specifically made against the passage of this bill in its application to this District. Opposed to these are the memorials of some twenty-five hundred persons who style themselves colored citizens of the District of Columbia, citizens of the United States, who say in substance that they are loyal, that they have served in the Army and Navy of the United States during this great conflict with rebellion, that they are sufficiently intelligent to vote, industrious, self-supporting, that they support churches and common schools, and educate their own children without any aid from the general school fund, and they claim upon these grounds not to be discriminated against in this particular.

Mr. President, if this were a question simply of a local character between the corporation of Washington, the mayor, aldermen, and common council and the electors of this District and the colored persons, I do not think it is doubtful what justice would seem to require. But, sir, it has a broader and more comprehensive meaning; it is in some sense general, and if the Senate will bear with me I propose to address myself to that particular phase of the question, the general objections to this bill, and the principles upon which I ask the votes of the Senate.

This is a matter affecting the capital of the nation, one in which the American people have an interest, as indirectly, at least, touching the country at large. What the national Congress pronounce here as a matter of right or expediency, or both, touching a question of popular rights, may have an influence elsewhere for good or for evil. We cannot well justify the denial of the right of suffrage to colored citizens on the protest of the voters of the corporation of Washington. We may not think fit to grant it simply on the prayer of the petitioners. Our action should rest on some recognized general principle, which, applied to the capital of the nation, would be equally just applied to any of the political communities of which the nation is composed. We may not exercise the ample power we possess over this District arbitrarily or in disregard of its effects upon the country at large.

It was upon this ground that the friends and advocates of the system of slavery objected to its abolition here by act of Congress. To abolish it here was to abolish it everywhere throughout the country; and if, as they contended, the nation was under covenant to suffer nothing to the injury of slavery in the States, they were right. If negro suffrage is wrong in principle, pernicious in the policy of American States and republican communities, and dangerous to popular liberty, Congress should hesitate to do an act, which, having the force of precedent, would endanger the peace and tranquillity of the nation.

We were most solemnly told on a former occasion by the opponents of the measure that such is its character and such would be its effects. They affirmed that this Government "is a white man's Government;" that it was instituted by, in the interests of, and for the advantage of the white race, and ought to be administered by that race exclusively, and for its development and benefit; that the negro race is an inferior race, wholly incapable of self-government, and that to invest it with civil and political rights is impolitic, unwise, and dangerous to the liberties of the white man, the dominant and superior race.

These assumptions are sufficiently sweeping, and would be conclusive upon the representatives of the American people if made good by an appeal to history and facts. I content myself with the statement of a few plain propositions in reply.

The gist of these assumptions is the old plea of man's incapacity for self-government, scarcely improved by the specification of inferior race, for the old argument since civil society was instituted was lack of natural aptitude for government in the masses. Now, sir, a Government of the people, its rightfulness and practicability, a moot question everywhere else, is no longer debatable in this country. We have put aside the creed of the despot, the monarchist, the aristocrat, and have affirmed the right and capacity of the people to govern themselves, and have staked the national life on the issue to make it good in practice. Not that every man of all races or of any race or people is capable of wise administration of public affairs, legislation, or interpretation of the laws; but that the aggregate public virtue and intelligence of political communities is the safest basis of government.

The masses may be trusted to select their rulers. To deny any portion of the American people civil or political rights common to the citizen upon pretense of race or color, is to ignore the fundamental principles of republicanism. We are fully committed to the rule of the people, and no question of race or color, inferiority or superiority, can arise to exclude any portion. They are none of them terms of exclusion. No sentiment was ever uttered, here or elsewhere, better calculated to bring this nation into contempt and to expose it to the hatred of the friends of popular government than that "this is a white man's Government," as no statement could well be more false to its origin and history.

Its founders professed to institute the Government in the interest of human rights. The American Declaration was a declaration of the political rights of man. The principles of the American Revolution were those of universal liberty. Otherwise that immortal Declaration of political rights should have been written, "All white men are created equal;" and the Puritan fathers should have rendered their gospel, "God hath made of one blood all white men," and instead of a democracy they should have set up an aristocracy to be transmitted as an inheritance to their posterity.

Sir, our power over the question of suffrage in this District is ample, unquestioned, and we have seen that the objections to its exercise are untenable; but the question returns, shall the right be extended to the negro, and if so, upon what principle, or upon the prescription of what particular formula?

It becomes important first to consider the right of suffrage, whether an absolute right or as incident to citizenship. On this question the public mind is divided between universal suffrage, manhood suffrage, and impartial suffrage, and perplexed with questions of sex as well as of race and color.

I glance only at each. Universal suffrage is affirmed by its advocates as among the absolute or natural rights of man, in the sense of mankind, extending to females as well as males, and susceptible of no limitation unless as opposed to child or infant. It is supposed to originate in rights independent of citizenship; like the absolute rights of liberty, personal security, and possession of property, it is natural to man. It exists, of course, independent of sex or condition, manhood or womanhood. To admit it in the adult and deny it to the youth would be to abridge the right and ignore the principle. Now, sir, in practice its extension to women would contravene all our notions of the family; "put asunder" husband and wife, and subvert the fundamental principles of family government, in which the husband is, by all usage and law, human and divine, the representative head. Besides it ignores woman, womanhood, and all that is womanly; all those distinctions of sex whose objects are apparent in creation, essential in character, and vital to society, these all disappear in the manly and impressive demonstration of balloting at a popular election. Here maids, women, wives, men, and husbands promiscuously assemble to vindicate the rights of human nature.

Moreover, it associates the wife and mother with policies of state, with public affairs, with making, interpreting, and executing the laws, with police and war, and necessarily disseverates her from purely domestic affairs, peculiar care for and duties of the family; and, worst of all, assigns her duties revolting to her nature and constitution, and wholly incompatible with those which spring from womanhood.

Besides, the ballot is the inseparable concomitant of the bayonet. Those who practice the one must be prepared to exercise the other. To introduce woman at the polls is to enroll her in the militia, to transfer her from the class of non-combatants to the class of combatants.

"Manhood suffrage," to define it, is simply to state the conditions of manhood, the state of an adult male grown to full size and strength. Its opposites are "childhood," "womanhood." In most nations, for purposes of war, it is a male person between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years. Among the civilians it was from fourteen to twenty-five. The condition of manhood, as defined by the lexicographers, is purely physical development, in distinction from moral and intellectual. In this sense the common law had no standard. It is impossible to conceive of a law that would meet in practice the individual cases as they would arise on the principle of physical development. The condition of manhood varies in individuals, and is developed at different periods.

The fatal objection to "manhood suffrage" is that the right is based on physical development, like arms-bearing, while the act itself necessarily implies intelligence, discretion, intellectual development.

The peculiar character, the genius of republicanism is equality, impartiality of rights and remedies among all the citizens, not that the citizen shall not be abridged in any of his natural rights. The man yields that right to the nation when he becomes a citizen. The republican guarantee is that all laws shall bear upon all alike in what they enjoin and forbid, grant and enforce. This principle of equality before the law is as old as civilization, but it does not prevent the State from qualifying the rights of the citizen according to the public necessities.

The American principle favors the right of suffrage for the male citizen of full age, supposed to be based upon the law and usage that at this age he becomes free of the tutelage of family and is free to manage his own affairs. The exceptions to the rule are of persons non compos mentis, persons deemed infamous from treason, felony, or other high crimes, persons supported at the public charge, and ignorant persons, and those of African descent.

The rule is in harmony with the idea of republican government and Christian civilization. Some of the exceptions are ill-timed, illogical, and unjust. Poverty is in no just sense a disqualifying fact. On the contrary, society may doubtless protect itself by depriving those of political power who have proved faithless to it or made war upon it. In a country where the means of education are accessible to all, or should be, and a knowledge of the Government important, it cannot be a grievance that the State should impose the rule of intelligent suffrage. The exceptional fact which stands out in flagrant violation of the common rule of suffrage is that which denies the right to the citizen of African descent on account of his race.

At the formation of the national Constitution in only one of the States was the negro excluded from the exercise of the right on account of his race or color. South Carolina excluded the negro; in the other States the exclusion was confined to condition, and the colored freeman was an elector. In most of the States the negro is now excluded; in some of them he is admitted upon exceptional terms; in others upon terms of impartiality with the whites. The proposition of the bill is to restore the American rule of suffrage at the national capital, to place it upon the republican principle, to make our legislation conform to the Constitutions, laws, usages, sentiments, and opinions of the people of the States at the revolutionary era of the Republic, when universal liberty was an aspiration alike of statesmen and people.

In the early constitutions of the States this principle was everywhere recognized and enforced. In the State of Pennsylvania the language was this: "All freemen have a right to elect officers, and be elected to office." That of Delaware was: "Every freeman hath a right of suffrage." That of Maryland: "All freemen shall have a right of suffrage." New York: "Every person who is a freeman shall be entitled to vote." North Carolina: "Every freeman shall be entitled to suffrage;" and so on to the end of the chapter, with the single exception of South Carolina. The disability which attached to the African slave was because of condition, and not of race or color, and everywhere the adult freeman was deemed entitled to the exercise of the elective franchise. The disability of condition now has been abolished. In the progress of events, the development of free institutions, the expansion of the principles of popular rights, the abolition of slavery, by the providence of God we have become a nation of freemen in fact as in name. The emancipated slave has become a freeman and a citizen, belongs to the body of the American people, and is no longer the subject of exclusion by either State or nation. Sir, the constitutional amendment which emancipated the slave gives Congress power to make that freedom of the slave complete. In the spirit of that provision, Congress at its last session enacted that every person born in the United States is a citizen thereof, and entitled to protection in his civil rights. It remains now to recognize that political equality which is the common right of the American citizen.

Sir, we exalt the emancipation proclamation in the scale of state papers to a place second only to that of the great American Declaration of Independence. To its omnipotent spirit we require obedience and submission. We are assured that the grandeur of its conceptions, its heroism, and elevated patriotism confer immortal renown on him whose name is most intimately associated with it; and still, sir, we hesitate to accept the logic of its results. We do not, some of us, see how it is possible to break down the partition walls of prejudice which spring from the relations of master and slave without disrupting society and introducing anarchy and violence. We do not understand how a nation can be just to all its people on principle and expect the support of "the virtuous ruling classes," and we do not see how we can survive without them. We have made the negro slave an American citizen, and we seem to start back from contact with him as if his touch were moral and political pollution. We have freed him and we are perplexed to know how to define him, whether a freedman, freeman, citizen, alien, or denizen. By some of us the rights incident to American citizenship are utterly denied as the result of emancipation. So long held and treated as a slave, a chattel, it is difficult to realize that he is a man, entitled to the recognition due from man to man. We are slow to confess this country his as well as ours, although native-born, and speak of deportation as if the commerce and navies of the world uniting in our folly and crime could accomplish it. We are still in our sins as to the gospel of one blood for all humanity and a common brotherhood, and cherish still the fatal delusion of antagonism of races.

A statement of a plain proposition or two should dissipate our alarm and settle all these questions. The negro is a man now and hereafter in American law, politics, society, and to be treated as such. He is a citizen, and entitled to the common rights of citizenship and to protection. We may as well comprehend the question of the negro. He will remain here an inhabitant of this country, our country, his country, and that not at our option, but by force of laws over which we have no control. Political history discloses no folly comparable with the attempt to rid a nation by force and violence of a numerous race of people indigenous to it, as it records no usurpation or royal crime at all equal to it. The negro cannot depart if he would. He is native to this country, and may stay here and bid defiance to power to remove him. He is to be a constant element of American life, civil, political, industrial. He constitutes one eighth of our population now, and in the future his proportion will not probably be much less. The race numbers four millions at the present, and will soon be thirty millions—too many to be immolated, if it were possible, upon the altar of our pride and our prejudice. The bond of our national unity is not expressed by epithets "rights of States," "State sovereignty," "community rights;" the fruits of such are insurrection, rebellion, civil war; but in unity of faith in human rights, unity of spirit and purpose for the development and protection of individual rights. In such unity there is completeness and power; it links with the moral and social forces of the universe and possesses the attributes of a boundless energy. All attempts in this country to keep alive the old idea of orders of men, distinctions of class, noble and ignoble, superior and inferior, antagonism of races, are so many efforts at insurrection and anarchy.

In a nation of professed freemen whose political axioms are those of universal liberty and human rights, no public tranquillity is possible while these rights are denied to portions of the American people. We have taken into the bosom of the Republic the diverse elements of the nationalities of Europe, and are attempting to mold them into national harmony and unity, and are still inviting other millions to come to us. Let us not despair that the same mighty energies and regenerating forces will be able to assign a docile and not untractable race its appropriate place in our system.

Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair an amendment is not now in order. The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is an amendment to an amendment. That amendment can only be amended by the consent of the mover.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress I delivered my sentiments at length in reference to the question of negro suffrage. I shall not again enter upon that question generally; but I desire to make a suggestion or two in regard to the special propositions of the amendment which I have had the honor to offer, and which is now the subject of consideration before the Senate. It is proposed as a substitute for the first section of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine. It will be recollected that at the last session the first section of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine was amended, not on my motion, but on the motion, I believe, of the Senator from Maine himself, so as to incorporate in lines four, five, six, and seven the words: "and excepting persons who may have voluntarily left the District of Columbia to give aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion."

Mr. President, the State which I represent has adopted a policy in which I concurred most heartily, providing that for the present those who have been engaged in rebellion against the Government shall be clothed with no political power; but it strikes me that that question presents itself in a different aspect when you come to apply it to the District of Columbia. The people of the District of Columbia have no political power; they cannot by their votes affect the principles or the foundation of our Government, and therefore there will be no danger to the policy, principles, or integrity of our Government by extending to them the right of suffrage. But, sir, they are equally interested with the loyal portion of the people of this District in all its municipal institutions, interested in the assessment and payment of taxes, interested in all those local matters which affect them personally, and they are as responsible for the discharge of all municipal duties and local liabilities as the loyal portion of the people of the District are.

It seems to me, then, that it would be rather hard to disfranchise even the disloyal portion of the people of the District of Columbia from the exercise of the right of selecting their local officers, who have no political power. They pay taxes, they are subject to taxation, they are under all the local liabilities of any citizens within the District. If we are willing to extend to them civil rights, if we are willing to protect them in the enjoyment of all their municipal rights upon an equality with the loyal citizens of the District, it seems to me that they ought also to have extended to them the right of suffrage so far as the municipal affairs of the District are concerned, so far as civil rights and municipal regulations and interests are concerned. I would therefore, under this view of the subject, be opposed to depriving citizens of the District of Columbia, who only have municipal authority and power and no political power, of the right of suffrage, and my amendment does not propose to disfranchise them in that respect.

Then again, sir, by reference to the amendment which I have had the honor to offer, it will be seen that the votes of the District are classified: first, all persons who were actually residents of the District at the last election in 1865, may be allowed to vote. There is another provision in it which disfranchises all persons who cannot hereafter read and who cannot write their names. I am perfectly aware that it is a very serious question how far we ought to limit the right of suffrage by a qualification of this character, and I think it would be hard to disfranchise any who has hitherto exercised that right; but then this amendment does not propose to do that; it only looks to the future. In many sections of the country this provision might operate harshly, where there are no free schools, where there are no provisions made, and no facilities afforded for education; but looking to the principles of our Government and the necessity of popular intelligence, it would seem to me that it would be not a very harsh provision of law if where free schools do exist, and where there are easy facilities for acquiring education, there were a provision of law making it criminal for any person over the age of twenty-one years not to be able to read and to write.

It seems to me, sir, that there ought to be some obligation, either in our fundamental laws in the States, or somewhere, by some means requiring the people to educate themselves; and if this can be accomplished by disqualifying those who are not educated for the exercise of the right of suffrage, thus stimulating them to acquire a reasonable degree of education, that of itself, it seems to me, would be a public blessing.

It will therefore be seen that my amendment does not propose to disfranchise any who are not able to read and write who have hitherto exercised the right of suffrage.

The second class of persons to whom I would extend the right of suffrage by this amendment, are all persons, residents of the District, who have been duly mustered into the service of the United States during the late rebellion, who have been or shall hereafter be honorably discharged therefrom, no matter what may be their literary qualifications or qualifications of intelligence. My amendment is based on the ground that he who has been thought worthy of bearing the bayonet and of periling his life for the institutions of the country should be entitled to the right of suffrage, no matter whether he can read or whether he can write his name or not.

These, I think, are the only distinctions between the amendment which I have had the honor to offer and the first section of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine; and for the reasons I have stated it strikes me my amendment is preferable.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for a division of the question, if it is susceptible of it, so that we may take the question in the first place on the first proposition of the Senator's amendment, which is: "All those persons who are actual residents of said District," &c.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish the Senator from Maine would state what amendment he proposes to make in case this should not be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. The proposition I intended to make is contained in the third clause of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, being a motion to strike out and insert, is not a divisible motion. It is in the power of the Senator from Maine, however, to move to perfect either the matter which it is proposed to strike out, or that which it is proposed to insert. The Senator from Maine may move to strike out any part of the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia; and that may accomplish the purpose he has in view.

Mr. MORRILL. With a view of bringing the attention of the Senate to the questions directly before the body presented by this measure, I move to strike out the first clause of the amendment; and I will now state to the Senate precisely how the bill stands, and what will be the question on that.

Mr. BROWN. The first clause of the committee's amendment?

Mr. MORRILL. No, the first clause of the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. As the bill now stands, it simply extends the right of suffrage to all the citizens of this District, excepting persons not of full age, persons non compos mentis and insane persons, and persons who were engaged in the late rebellion. This is the bill as it stands. The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is that all persons who were actual residents of the District, and qualified to vote therein in the elections held in the year 1865, under the statutes then in force, may vote. The Senate will see that if they are in favor of the restriction disqualifying those who went into the rebellion it will be inconsistent to adopt this amendment, because this might allow such persons to vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my colleague that the purpose would be accomplished more readily if the Senator from West Virginia would amend his amendment; and, perhaps, he will agree to insert in his amendment the words, "excepting persons who have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion." You do not want to say anything about having left the District; but make a special exception of persons who have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion. If the Senator from West Virginia would insert that exception in his first clause, it would free it from the difficulty which my colleague suggests. I suppose it to be in his power to do so.

Mr. WILLEY. If the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] had heard the remarks which I made a little while since he would have seen that I do not concur in the propriety of making such an exception. I stated my view of the case to be that a proposition to disfranchise those in the District of Columbia who had been engaged in the rebellion stood upon very different reasons from those it would stand upon in any of the States where the voter had the exercise of any political power. I stated that in the District of Columbia the people had no political power, and therefore the exercise of the right of suffrage could in no wise affect the policy or foundation, the integrity or the principles of the Government; and that if it was proper to extend to the people of the District of Columbia the enjoyment of mere civil rights, to protect them in their persons and in their estates, I thought, and I still think, it would be rather harsh to deprive them of the right of selecting municipal officers, and of voting upon all subjects which would be affected by the right of suffrage in the District affecting their local and municipal interests. For these reasons I decline to accept the proposition suggested by the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the amendment to the amendment now pending be amended by striking out the clause named by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL]. This is in order, as it is to perfect the words proposed to be inserted before the question is put on the insertion.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say in a single word that those who are satisfied with the bill, "pure and simple," as the phrase is, as it comes from the committee, and desire to make no further restriction, ought to vote down these amendments; while those who are in favor of making a further restriction, as contained in the last line of the third clause, which is "who can read and write their names," can vote down the two first clauses of the amendment and save that; and that is all there is in the proposition of the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to strike out the clause alluded to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move to strike out the second clause.

Mr. BROWN. Why not strike them all out, and make that amendment which you propose a separate one hereafter?

Mr. MORRILL. I shall reach the same thing by bringing the Senate to a vote on striking out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The object can be accomplished by simply rejecting the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the second clause and all of the third clause down to the word "and," in the eighteenth line. That leaves the qualification "who can read and who can write their names."

Mr. BROWN, and others. Vote it all down.

Mr. MORRILL. On the whole, I think I had better withdraw my motion and then let the question be on adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. That will test the sense of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I hope, Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be voted down, and that we shall take the first section of the bill introduced originally by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I prefer that section to the first section of the amendment reported by the committee. I do so for the reason that I do not believe it to be wise in passing this act to disfranchise the few persons who went from this District into the rebellion. As a practical matter, that disfranchisement does not amount to anything. I am in favor of unrestricted manhood suffrage, qualified simply as to age and time of residence. I hope that in the first section of the bill "six months" will be stricken out and "one year" inserted; and then I am for the further restriction of six or three months' residence in the ward or election district. That will fix, I think, the proper time, one year's residence in the District of Columbia, and six or three months in the ward or election district where the elector offers to vote. I think those qualifications ought to be required of every man for the public security, whether he be black or white.

I am against this qualification of reading and writing. I never did believe in it. I do not believe in it now. I voted against it in my own State, and I intend to vote against it here. There was a time when I would have taken it because I did not know that we could get anything more in this contest; but I think the great victory of manhood suffrage is about achieved in this country. I think we are in a position when we can command it, and I am for commanding it; and I am for beginning now in this District where we have the absolute control and power. For that reason I am opposed to this amendment.

I would at one time have agreed to settle the question on the basis early promulgated by the New York Herald, of giving suffrage in the rebel States to those who served in the Army, those who held a certain amount of property, those who could read and write, those who were members of Christian churches. These qualifications suggested early by that journal I assented to then as a beginning; I believe we have gone beyond all beginnings now. During the last few months the country has gone an immeasurable distance in the right direction, and I believe to-day that the nation is prepared to demand manhood suffrage, and I am against any final adjustment or settlement of this question that does not demand it now. I think there are hundreds of thousands of men in the land who have been educated up to this great truth, that the poor men and the ignorant men of this country need the ballot for their protection, the protection of their property, their liberties, and their lives. I believe that there are hundreds of thousands of men who hold that opinion to-day who did not hold it six months ago. I think we are moving in the right direction. Time and circumstance are working in behalf of that great cause.

Now, we have before us a bill to extend the suffrage in the District of Columbia. There has been a great deal said about it, but the fact was, and we cannot deny it, that when the House bill was passed we had not the power to pass it and make it a law until the closing days of the last session. I speak, of course, on the assumption that its final passage would have required for it a two-thirds vote in this body. We have the power now to pass a clean bill, and the country demands it. At any rate I know it is right and I shall vote against any qualifications or restrictions other than those embraced in the original bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio. I think it proper, however, to amend his bill by requiring one year's residence in the District of Columbia instead of six months, and by further requiring a residence of six months in the ward or election district where the person offers to vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it is not my intention to enter into any discussion of the merits of this measure, though I may take occasion to express my disapprobation of it in every form in which it has or can be presented to the Senate before the final vote shall be taken on its passage.

Sir, during the last political campaign in my State we were visited by many speakers from different States, some professing to come from Louisiana, some from Mississippi, some from Tennessee, some from Virginia, and among the rest we were visited by my distinguished friend, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON]. Sir, I was apprised of the fact that he was coming to visit that State to enlighten us in reference to our duty as voters, and I notified popular audiences that I believed he was a frank and open speaker, who would state honestly his opinions; but lest by any lapse of memory he should forget to express himself within the limits of the State of Delaware upon the question which we deemed so vital, I suggested to them the propriety of asking him his own opinion and the opinions of his party. Sir, he visited the capital of the State; his speech was published in the public press of that State; but instead of meeting this question and giving his opinion or the opinion of his party in reference to manhood suffrage, his speech was composed of laudations of the Republican party, of what it had done for the country, its great achievements, how it was composed of brave men and brave women, but in reference to manhood suffrage or negro suffrage in any shape or form, qualified or unqualified, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts did not deign to enlighten us.

Sir, notwithstanding this omission, this prudential omission of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the published proceedings of the Senate and House of Representatives had indicated to the people of that State what was the opinion of the dominant party in this country; dominant, not in numbers, but dominant as far as the present exercise of political power may be considered; and the people of that State made up their minds to what their intention was, to force negro suffrage. Then, sir, in that gallant little State, which believes that this is a white man's Government and was made by white men for the benefit of white men, we elected our State ticket by a larger majority than was ever before given to a State ticket in that State. I hope that the next time the distinguished Senator visits our State, and I assure him that I had no objection whatever to his visiting us, he will then express more clearly and definitely to the people his own opinions and the opinions of his party upon this question; but, sir, I will not trespass upon the attention of the Senate now. Before the final vote perhaps I may have some occasion to notice the "infidelity" alleged to exist on the part of myself and others by the distinguished Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. WILSON. It is true, Mr. President, that I visited the State of Delaware during the last canvass; and knowing very well that I was in a State where not much progress had been made, I acted somewhat on the scriptural principle of giving "milk to babes." I had, however, for many a year been in the habit where ever I had spoken, in the Senate and in the country, in my own State and other States, in the East, in the center, and in the West, of giving the "strong meat" of equal suffrage. If the Senator has a copy of my speech to which he refers, which was, I believe, printed in pamphlet form and distributed over his State, he will find that I laid down the broad principle that I would give to every man of any race, color, or condition the same rights and privileges that I possessed myself, or that anybody in the country possessed. I do not know that the Senator acted in regard to that statement of mine as did some of the presses advocating the cause of his party and some of their speakers; but I know that some of them took occasion to indulge in sneers at the declaration that I regarded every man before the law of my country my peer and my equal, whether he was a white man or a black man. I certainly laid down doctrines plain and clear, which the Senator had a right to understand meant giving to colored men all the rights and all the privileges of citizens of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have accomplished my purpose. If the Senator considered that he was among babes he ought to have given them pure milk, and ought not to have diluted it too much with water. I only wanted the Senator to acknowledge that he had not spoken fully out his real opinions on this subject. He assigns the reason that we were babes and not prepared for strong meat. Perhaps we shall get strong enough by another election, and I hope that the Senator will then bring not only his milk-can, but his meat-basket, and that he will extend his visit beyond the capital of the State and come into the lower portion of it where I reside, and I assure him that there we not only drink milk, but we are in the habit of eating very strong meat.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, this phrase "manhood suffrage" sounds very well, and I am sure I have no objection to it; but I am particularly desirous that my amendment shall prevail so as to incorporate in this bill the qualification of intelligence. Sir, what is manhood suffrage? Does "manhood," considered in its political acceptation, consist simply in physical power, in arms and feet and hands and face? Does not the manhood that should be demanded as the basis of the right of suffrage mean something more than this? Does it not mean intelligence sufficient to appreciate the duty to be performed? Does it not mean some degree of moral character and standing? The pauper is a man and yet you exclude him. The convict is a man and yet you exclude him. Our sons under twenty-one years of age are a portion of the common brotherhood and manhood of the country, and yet you exclude them. Our wives and our daughters are in the same category, and yet they are excluded. So then the question involves some principle by which it shall be regulated; and it does seem to me that the true interests of a free Government, and the wise establishment of a free Government, require the great and fundamental qualification of intelligence, when we propose to extend the fundamental right of suffrage to any of our citizens.

I know how hard it is to provide any rule that shall operate equally. We have provided a rule as regards age, and how unequally does that operate! Yet it was necessary. Thousands of our sons under twenty-one years of age are much better qualified to exercise the right of suffrage than thousands of our fellow-citizens fifty years of age. We must have some rule, and we have fixed twenty-one years of age in that respect as the wisest and best rule that could be propounded.

Now, it strikes me that, looking especially to the qualifications of the class of population in this District to whom it is proposed to extend the right of suffrage; looking to their antecedents; remembering who they are—but a short time taken from the worst and lowest type of barbarism in all the world; reflecting that they have been recently slaves; that they inherit and still have in them the instincts of slavery; that they are ignorant; that it is impossible for them (it is no fault of theirs; it is their misfortune) to have a correct appreciation of the duties devolving upon a man who exercises the right of suffrage to understand fully the principles of our free Government; I say, under all these circumstances, it does seem to me that wisdom dictates to us the propriety, if possible, of fixing some rule by which that great right shall be protected from abuse, some rule by which we shall confine its exercise to those who are competent to use it judiciously.

I am not particularly anxious that this principle in my amendment shall prevail; but I have thought that perhaps as this is somewhat of an experiment, we might try it in the District of Columbia. It cannot operate very harshly upon the freed people of this District. You say that they cannot read and write; but this does not impose any prohibition upon them acquiring that faculty. It is rather a reason and a motive to stimulate them to the acquisition of knowledge, to acquire the ability to read and write; and in that respect it would operate as a distinct advantage to them. I think perhaps, Mr. President, in our eagerness and desire to be liberal in this direction, we are in danger of going too far, and that we ought to take counsel of some discretion at least, and in this, our first experiment, require some condition that the exercise of this great right shall be confined to those who may be expected to have some reasonable apprehension of what it means and how it ought to be used.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that it is in order to perfect the words proposed by the Senator from West Virginia to be inserted in lieu of what it is moved to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the matter proposed to be inserted:

But no person shall have the right to vote who in any way gave aid and comfort to the enemy during the late rebellion.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Rhode Island will not, I trust, press that amendment. We better not meddle with that matter of disfranchisement. There are but few of these persons here, so the prohibition will practically not amount to anything. As we are to accomplish a great object, to establish universal suffrage, we should let alone all propositions excluding a few men here. Disfranchisement will create more feeling and more bitterness than enfranchisement.

I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that if the colored men of the country possessed the right of suffrage you would not witness the legislation that has taken place in the rebel States during the last few months. You would not find these poor men hunted down, but, on the contrary, you would find some of the men who are now hunting them down passing unjust laws against them, seeking them, and professing friendship and devotion to their cause.

I do not believe the country has suffered much from 1789 to this time on account of the ignorance of voters; it has suffered far more from the character of the voters. The people of the country, the laboring men of the nation, desire proper legislation. They are for just, equal, and humane laws. They are patriotic, and they have generally proved it; and you often find them by the hundreds and by the thousands voting nearer right than many of the most intelligent men in the country who have personal ends to accomplish. I would rather trust the interests of the country and the rights of man to the votes of that class of men who have no personal objects, who have no desire except to secure just and equal legislation, than to the votes of tens and hundreds of thousands of men who have personal interests to secure by the legislation of the country, both State and national.

Many men who are not able to read and write are pure, high-minded, true men, who love their country and love justice. These men have made a better record for the last thirty years for country, for liberty, for justice and humanity than have some of the most learned men in the land. If you could establish as a standard of suffrage integrity of character, I would agree to it; but as only the eye of God can judge the heart of man we cannot make that standard a test.

I am against putting on the restriction of reading and writing in this District. Here is a race of men, law-abiding, hard-working, toiling men, who have been true to the country when others were false; who have been law-abiding when others violated the laws; who have been industrious and careful when others have been indolent and squandered their substance. I undertake to say that during the last ten years this class of men in this District have been the equals of the average of the white race of the District in the observance of the laws of the nation and the laws of God. They have been kept out of your schools and allowed no privileges of education, and now what do you propose to do? These men cannot read and write, but they are generally honest, upright, good men.

You do not propose to let them vote until they can read and write! Perhaps they will never be able to read and write. I think these poor toiling men, above all other men in the District, need to hold in their hands the ballot. It dignifies poor men, it gives them power and strength; and to confer it upon them it is perfectly safe for the District and safe for the whole country. There is a great difference between a man holding in his own hands the right to protect his life, his liberty, his property, and the rights of his wife and children, and the man who is forced to depend upon the good will of others.

We hear a good deal of the evils of ignorant suffrage. Sir, the country has suffered far more during the last twenty years from the selfish conduct and unpatriotic conduct of intelligent men. There is no danger in extending suffrage; it is just and safe. We are now about to settle the question for the District of Columbia, and we should settle it upon the solid basis of allowing every man to vote who is twenty-one years of age; who has been a resident here one year; who is not a pauper; and who has not committed an infamous offense.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the Senator from Massachusetts underestimates or undervalues the importance of the amendment just moved by the Senator from Rhode Island. The Senator from Rhode Island has not moved the amendment in the language of the committee. The committee's amendment disfranchised persons who had voluntarily left this District to join the rebellion. That, as the Senator from Massachusetts well says, might be a small affair, being confined to a few persons. But the amendment now moved by the Senator from Rhode Island is a restriction on all persons who have been engaged in the rebellion, whether they left the District to join it or not. I do not know that the fact of having left the District added particularly to their offense, and the Senator from West Virginia thinks it was a palliation; because in the District they had no political rights, and, therefore, could not have committed a crime like that of a man who left the responsibilities of a State to join a rebellion against the United States. But the Senator from Massachusetts must be aware that this bill if it becomes a statute is to remain as we hope for all time to come, and I think it is important to have a statute here that shall disfranchise men engaged in the rebellion whether they left the District for that purpose or whether they now come for the first time.

I regard this bill as important, in the second place, because it is a sort of model, to be copied and patterned after by the States. In the Northwest I know there are States that have not hitherto given suffrage to colored men, but they are moving in that direction, and will copy this very statute, if we make it one, for their law. That is a reason why I think we ought to have the statute perfect here.

● I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island because I believe that it is right. If a man who is so poor and unfortunate as not to be able to support himself is to be disfranchised; if a man who has been guilty of no crime, but who is not able to read and write, is to be disfranchised, why not disfranchise a man who has been engaged in rebellion; who has been for years making war on the Government; and even, perhaps, taken an oath of allegiance to another Government? Such a man ought to be naturalized, at any rate, before he comes back to our Government. Let him wait five years.

I agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts has said in regard to the requirements of reading and writing as a qualification for voting. That might be entertained in a State where all the people were allowed to go to school and learn to read and write; but it seems to me monstrous to apply it to a class of persons in this community who were legislated away from school, to whom every avenue of learning was shut up by law.

When the vote comes to be taken I shall vote to give the ballot to every man of the prescribed age and of the proper residence who has not been guilty of a crime, I care not for his complexion or his nationality. I have found that there are Americans who were not born here. A man is an American if he has got an American heart in him. Those of us who were born here could not help it. The man who is an American from choice deserves a little something in addition to those who are Americans from necessity. Therefore, I say I would not disfranchise those who come here joyfully to yield themselves to the moldering influence of American civilization.

I think we ought to have this amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island incorporated in the bill. In my opinion it would be better to vote down the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and move this proposition as an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is suggested that the word "voluntarily" should be inserted in my amendment, so as to be read "those who voluntarily gave aid and comfort." I will also modify the amendment by substituting the word "rebels" for "enemies."

I cannot respond to the appeal of my friend from Massachusetts to withdraw the amendment. I did not suppose it would meet the opposition of a single Senator, and least of all of the Senator from Massachusetts. There is no class of people, black or white, male or female, old or young, that I would disfranchise so quickly, or that I would enfranchise so reluctantly, as those who have taken up arms against the country; and all the embitterment which that may cause, and I have no doubt it will cause a great deal, is a very healthy embitterment, which I think we should not attempt to conciliate, but should rather put down.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island what provision he proposes for the purpose of determining who are the guilty persons at whom he aims. Who shall try, who shall determine their guilt? because that is most important. To insert merely a prohibitory provision without providing any means by which the persons stigmatized would be fixed, set apart from the rest of the society, is simply a nullity.

Another question I should like to put to the honorable Senator. However doubtful the question might be as to the people of the several States of the Union, I think nobody ever doubted that the inhabitants of the District of Columbia owed a direct and personal allegiance to this Government, that to them it was a complete, perfect Government in all respects. It is said some of them have violated the laws of that Government. Now, I would like to ask the honorable Senator upon what principle heretofore recognized among civilized Governments he can impose upon them any penalties except those which the laws impose, and how they can be imposed in any other way than by the law, and how he can propose to do that in the face of the plain provisions of the Constitution which forbid bills of attainder and which forbid ex post facto laws. Now, if I understand him, he proposes to deprive persons who have been heretofore entitled to the right of voting of that right. That is punishment, that is penalty. Have they incurred it? Was there any law imposing that punishment upon any offense in this District heretofore? If there was, then it may well be imposed now; but if there was no law of that kind, how can you now enact a law by which to bring about that result without encountering the difficulty of facing the ex post facto provision?

If these were inhabitants of States holding to the theory that the primary allegiance was not due to the United States but to the State, then we might with some show perhaps attempt to perpetrate this thing. But they are citizens of the District of Columbia, residing here, and who owe direct and personal allegiance to this Government. It is their Government; and I ask upon what principle can the Government deprive them of their right to a trial by the law, because it is not to be assumed that they are guilty. The law never makes that assumption. The very first principle of our law is the assumption that all men are innocent, and that not even all the guilty are to be punished, but only those of the guilty whom you can show to be guilty according to the forms and provisions of the law beyond all reasonable doubt. That is the right of an American citizen. If he has not that right, what has he? It is the sum-total of American liberty. It is the end and aim of this whole fabric. It is the result of eighteen hundred years of struggle.

Then when you meet a man who is alleged to have aided the rebellion, what does the law presume? The law presumes he is innocent. The question of his guilt is the first thing to be determined. The law is upon his side with its humanity, and it presumes him innocent. How is the fact to be ascertained? The Constitution declares that it must be by due process of law. This is fundamental, elementary, lying at the bottom of the whole fabric. To take it away is to destroy everything that is sacred among us.

Now, I ask Senators to apply this to themselves. What would you say if you were charged with a crime? If you are innocent you would claim the right of an American citizen to have a fair trial according to the forms of the law; and as the law does not know whether you are innocent or guilty it gives to the guilty precisely the same rights that you have. Now how can that be done in this District? How is it possible? Is this offense to be found by a grand jury? Is that to be understood? If it is to be found by a grand jury, is it then to be tried by a petit jury, presided over by a judge learned in the law? And how is the judge to inflict this sentence; how is he to impose this penalty, a penalty which you propose to make here on the 10th of December, 1866, long after the offense was committed? And yet you say that you preserve the principle that no ex post facto law shall be passed!

Mr. President, with me it is a fundamental principle that citizens owe allegiance to the Government to which they are subjects, and that under no circumstance can those citizens incur any penalties whatever unless they be prescribed by the laws before the offenses to which they apply are committed. To impose them afterward is worse than all the tyrannies that have ever been denounced heretofore. The first thing the tyrant in the law is taught is to abhor the name of Caligula, and why? Not that he did not enact his laws before the happening of the offense, not that the laws were not prescribed and published before the offense; but he was denounced as the most horrible and cruel of all tyrants because he caused them to be written in small letters and posted upon the tops of high posts, so that the people could not read them, and then after his people had violated them, imposed the penalty. That was humanity itself compared with this mode of imposing a penalty. That was a cruelty which might have been surmounted by a step-ladder; but here is a cruelty contemplated for which there is no remedy and there can be no remedy. No man can tell what punishment his conduct may deserve if it is not to be determined until after he commits the crime.

Now, Mr. President, all this thing is simple; it is within the reach and grasp of gentlemen who love the Constitution and love the laws. If there is any man in the District of Columbia who has committed the crime of treason, here is a Government over him which has affixed a penalty to that crime, which has all the machinery ready to try him, ready to convict him, and ready to enforce the penalty to the utmost. Why should we overturn all that is sacred in the past; why should we wish to stultify ourselves at this late day in setting aside all this wise provision which has been tested by time and ages, and resort to this trifling. I beg pardon, I have no wish to offend by saying "trifling," but it is trifling. A man who commits treason, the highest of all crimes, is to be discharged upon being deprived of the right of suffrage! I am not one of those who believe that all participation in the late rebellion was treason, but I am of those who do believe that treason was committed against this Government; and I say that if a man from this District, within the shadow of this Capitol, who could have been protected by the power of the United States here, went away and joined himself with those who were making war upon this Government he was guilty of treason; and to tell me that he has incurred no other penalty than that of being deprived of the right of suffrage is trifling, and trifling with the most sacred of things.

What is to prevent such a man being punished, and punished by the law? You talk about punishing traitors; but if there are such people why are they not punished? You have courts and juries, you have all the machinery here, and you have, as I said before, victims within your grasp. If you want to vindicate the law, do so, the law that you prescribe; not upon high posts, not pitfalls that you dig for the citizen, but vindicate the laws you have enacted solemnly, which are upon your statute-books, and which are the will and the embodiment of the will of the American people, whose will is to be so much respected. Is there any difficulty about it? Who alleges a difficulty? Who says it cannot be done? Whoever says it cannot be done asserts the failure of the Government, because that Government which cannot enforce its laws, which cannot impose the penalty they prescribe, and which cannot punish the guilty according to their process and according to their provisions, is no Government at all; it has failed in the very thing for which it was established.

Then, Mr. President, in this District especially, where this is undoubtedly the Government; where there is no double allegiance; where there is no double system of laws; where there is no conceivable difficulty about the duty of the citizen and the line he is to take in regard to his country, I object to this. I object to this amendment, in the first place, that it provides no mode by which the offense can be ascertained; in the second place, that it imposes a punishment which is ex post facto; and in the third place, that it is trifling with the highest crime known among men. What would the honorable Senator from Rhode Island say if there were a dozen murderers in the District and he were to propose to exclude them from the right of suffrage? How he would shock the sensibilities of the whole community if he were to propose to discharge them upon such a condition as his amendment discloses here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not propose that. The penalties of treason still remain.

Mr. COWAN. It proposes to impose a punishment for a specific offense. Whether it proposes to exempt them from punishment for the crime of treason I am not prepared to say; because there is nothing in the amendment which throws any light upon that subject; but the fair inference is that he is to be satisfied if he attains this end, that this is to be a condonation of the offense, this is to be in full discharge of it.

But to pursue the other idea a moment further; if he supposed these people guilty of murder, what would be thought of the proposition in that case? And yet treason is a crime of infinitely greater magnitude, of infinitely deeper dye than murder. In the case of murder how many men would rise in their places and protest against the imposition of such a penalty as this upon the murderer, even in addition to the others?

The Senator from Maine suggests that the penalties for treason still remain. Suppose they do and are to be executed according to the law, what is this additional penalty worth? Of how much effect will be disfranchisement after a man has suffered the capital penalty, after his neck is broken? So that upon either horn of the dilemma it is an absurdity. Impose such penalties upon the offender as he has earned by his crime; impose them in that dignified manner and according to the forms of the law which have been sanctified by ages and which every lawyer at least ought to stand by and stand upon, as he knows they are the molds in which liberty and freedom are cast, and in which they are preserved; let it be done decently and in order; and now, after the great struggle for national existence is over, after the smoke has cleared away from the battlefield, after a new and a better Union rises in the prospect, let us not degrade ourselves in the eyes of coming posterity by such trifling as this.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I do not know of any Senator who can pile up objections or sweep them away more readily than the Senator from Pennsylvania; but certainly I did not expect to have the amendment objected to upon such grounds. The first is that there is no mode of ascertaining this disqualification provided in the amendment. There is a mode in the sixth section of the bill which provides for ascertaining all the qualifications, and I apprehend it is no more difficult to ascertain whether a man has violated this condition than it is to ascertain whether he is of the lawful age, whether he has been the proper time resident in the District and in the ward where he offers to vote. I suppose that will be ascertained, first, by the evidence of the person offering himself as an elector, and then by the evidence of other persons that may be adduced, all given under the pains and penalties of perjury; and if a man who has given aid and comfort to the enemy should come forward and offer to vote and should make oath that he had not given aid and comfort to the enemy, he could then be tried for perjury—

Mr. COWAN. You admit he would vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly; and if a person who was twenty years of age should come forward and swear that he was twenty-one he could vote; if a man should come in and swear that he had been here a year, when he had been here only six days, he would vote, but he would vote under the penalty of the law. The law provides the same penalty for illegal voting in that respect as in others.

I am sure the Senator from Pennsylvania does not differ from me in holding that suffrage is not a natural right, but a right derived from society, and society has perfect power to impose any conditions that it sees fit upon the exercise of that right. Here is a bill to extend that right to certain other persons, and because a class of persons are excluded from that privilege he says it is an ex post facto law, and a man is punished by it! This is not a bill to punish people; it is a bill to enfranchise people; but it excepts from the enfranchisement certain persons; and the Senator from Pennsylvania says that is imposing a penalty on them for a crime committed before the law was passed!

Mr. COWAN. If the honorable Senator from Rhode Island will allow me, I am perfectly free to say that if these people never had a right to vote before then he could except any of them he chooses. For instance, this is a bill to enfranchise the people of color of this city. It is not necessary that it should enfranchise all of them. It may exclude as many of them as it chooses. But the point I make is, that here is a man who has by law this right, and you propose to take it away from him by way of penalty.

Mr. ANTHONY. He has no right to vote now, because he is guilty of an infamous offense, and is not allowed to vote under any law. It works no injury upon such persons.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have a right to change our laws in regard to suffrage.

Mr. COWAN. You cannot exclude him for an infamous offense until convicted.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator hold that we cannot change the law of suffrage by restricting it without imposing a penalty on all those who have ever exercised it? I think that is only more trifling—he will allow me to use his own word—than the allegation that because we refuse to allow a man to vote on the ground that he has committed treason, therefore we condone the offense! I do not see how the refusal to permit a man to vote on account of having committed an offense condones that offense, or how he is thereby relieved from the penalty of the law. I think that if we can have no stronger objections than those which my friend from Pennsylvania has urged, I shall have the unanimous vote of the Senate for the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not intend to argue just at this moment the question of disfranchising all who have participated in the rebellion; I may have occasion to say something about that when the question comes up in another shape; but as I understand it, the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is intended to perfect the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia, which amendment contemplates requiring a test of reading and writing as a qualification for voting. I am opposed to that requirement. I do not think it is wise; I do not think it is right; and I therefore shall not vote in any way to perfect an amendment which has that in it. For that reason I shall cast my vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not wish to see that clause ingrafted on the bill, and I do not want to see it put in such a shape as will render it stronger before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I voted for the proposition of the Senator from Maine to strike out the first clause of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia under a misunderstanding. I thought the proposition was to strike out the last line of the amendment, which excludes from the right of voting those who cannot read and write. As I voted under a misunderstanding of the question, and as I think the striking out of this first clause mars the entire proposition to such an extent that the Senator cannot have the benefit of his entire proposition, I move to reconsider that vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to reconsider the vote on the motion of the Senator from Maine, striking out a portion of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, which is to strike out the first section of the amendment reported by the committee, and insert his amendment as it has been amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe it is first in order to further perfect the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to strike out from the eighteenth line of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia the words, "and who shall have paid the taxes assessed against them," so as to leave that out as a condition of suffrage. The language is, I think, a little ambiguous. The implication is left to some extent, as it appears to me, that unless taxes are assessed the suffrage is not to be conferred or extended. At least there is a little doubt there. Even if that were not the case, I do not know any reason why a debt to the State should be regarded and treated as more sacred than a debt to a citizen or a private party; and I for one do not believe in making the payment of debts a condition of suffrage. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that condition, saying nothing as to how I shall vote eventually. I move to strike out the words I have indicated.

Mr. WILLEY. I have no very decided objection to that amendment, but I will suggest to the honorable Senator from California a reason why I think a provision of that kind ought to be incorporated into the bill prescribing the qualifications of voters. It must have been observed by him, it must be patent to his observation, that the population of this District is very fluctuating; there is nothing very stationary about a great proportion of it. They are here to-day and gone to-morrow. The idea had in view when I incorporated that provision in this clause of my amendment was that it would be some kind of evidence that they had a permanent residence here or some interest in the District that might entitle them to the right of suffrage. I am, however, very indifferent about it, as, indeed, I am about the whole amendment as it is now amended.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire while the Senator is up to suggest to him that it also involves the difficulty of cases where an assessment against a citizen is pending which he complains of as being an unjust assessment, and the question is unadjusted and undecided. Unless the tax is paid by election day the citizen will be deprived of the right to vote.

Mr. WILLEY. I simply desire to say while I am up, that since the first clause of this amendment has been stricken out, and since it has been amended further by the proposition submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island, I cannot vote for the amendment in the position it now stands, and therefore I am perfectly indifferent in what form it is put.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the reading of the amendment of the honorable Senator from West Virginia as amended.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to strike out the first section of the amendment reported by the committee, and in lieu of it to insert:

That in all elections to be held hereafter in the District of Columbia the following described persons, and those only, shall have the right to vote, to wit:

All persons, residents of said District, who have been duly mustered into the military or naval service of the United States during the late rebellion, and have been, or shall hereafter be, honorably discharged therefrom.

Male citizens of the United States who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years (excepting paupers, persons non compos mentis, or convicted of an infamous offense) and who, being residents of the ward or district in which they shall offer to vote, shall have resided in said district for the period of one year next preceding any election, and who shall have paid the taxes assessed against them, and who can read and who can write their names. But no person shall have the right to vote who in any way voluntarily gave aid and comfort to the rebels during the late rebellion.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the amendment as it has now been amended, any person in the District of Columbia who cannot read or write, whether white or black, will be disfranchised.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. CRESWELL. Certainly; it is retrospective as well as prospective.

Mr. SHERMAN. The first clause, which allowed all who previously voted to vote is stricken out, and now the proposition is simply that persons who can read and write and have paid taxes, who have not taken part in the rebellion, shall vote. I am not prepared to apply a test of that kind to the people of this District, which has been applied in no State of the Union but one, I believe, and that the State of Massachusetts. Great dissatisfaction exists in that State as to the application of the principle. To say that a man who has not had the advantage of an early education, who probably had not the means and opportunity to acquire reading and writing, shall not be allowed to vote, and to apply that to the District of Columbia, it seems to me would be traveling backward in the race of progress instead of forward. The amendment is left so imperfect that it is scarcely worth while to debate it, for it cannot be adopted as it is.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, if it was possible to make a thing wholly bad any better by amendments recognizing its bad principle, perhaps this amendment might be better than the section which is proposed to be stricken out; but while I would exclude no white man in the District of Columbia or elsewhere from exercising the right of suffrage because he could not read or write, I would not in the District of Columbia or elsewhere vote for negro suffrage under any circumstances or with the requirement of any amount of education. Sir, there are about thirty-five thousand of this class of people now in this District I am told. There are about one hundred thousand inhabitants I am informed in the District. Pass this bill, and this "paradise," as the District was said to be when the bill giving freedom to the slaves of this District was passed.

will be their paradise indeed, and in less than two years from this time it will be flooded by negroes from all parts of the country, and your mayors and your corporation officers will be composed of negroes. Sir, I want to keep my humble record right upon this question of negro suffrage, and therefore although an amendment to this bill might possibly be better than the original bill, yet that amendment recognizing the right of the negro race to vote I cannot under any circumstances vote for it.

I do not believe that the interest of the people of this District, whether white or black, requires such an enactment as this. In my own State, more than one fifth of whose inhabitants are composed of negroes, would I vote for any such measure as this? No, sir. Is there a Senator on this floor who, if in his own State there was such a proportion of negroes to the white population, would vote for giving the right of suffrage in his State to the negro race? Sir, it may do very well for gentlemen representing States in which there are not enough of the negro race to make mile-posts along the public roads to vote for a measure of this kind, because it is hardly within the range of possibility that any great amount of injury can result to such States; but where the races are so nearly equal, and where it is reasonable to suppose that the "paradise" opened up for negroes will be filled with more negroes than whites, I hold that I should be derelict in duty to my own race, which I believe to be superior in all respects to the negro race, if I were to vote to give them the right of suffrage under any circumstances whatever.

Mr. CONNESS. As the Senator having charge of this amendment has apparently abandoned it, and my motion was intended to perfect the amendment, I will withdraw the motion, so that the Senate may come to a vote upon the main amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to amend made by the Senator from California is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] striking out the first section of the amendment of the committee after the enacting clause, and inserting what has been read at the desk in lieu of the first section; and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I received a note from the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. FOWLER,] this morning stating that he is detained from the Senate by the illness of his wife, and for that reason he cannot be present.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yea 1, nays 41; as follows:

YEA—Mr. Kirkwood—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—41.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cragin, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, and Nye—10.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee in section one, line eight, by striking out the word "six," the last word in that line, and also by striking out the word "months," the first word in the next line, and inserting the words "one year," so as to require a residence in the District for one year previous to any election instead of six months.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator to modify that amendment so as to insert after the word "of," in the eighth line, the words "one year and in the ward or precinct in which he shall offer to vote six months previous to any election therein." That would require a residence of one year in the District and six months in the ward where the man offers to vote.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. When is the election here?

Mr. MORRILL. In March.

Mr. WILSON. It does not matter when the election is. The election here will be next June, I think. But there is this consideration: we do not want to encourage men to go from one ward to another to carry a special election. What we want is everybody to vote and to have honest voters. I think if we require a residence of one year in the District and six months in the ward or election precinct where the man offers to vote it will be a check and a guard upon illegal voting and secure fair play.

Mr. CRESWELL. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that his amendment is imperfect unless he further provides that a man moving from one ward to another shall have the right to vote in the ward from which he moved until he acquires the right to vote in the ward in which he has moved. Otherwise, a citizen of Washington might be five months in a ward and in that way lose his vote, although he had never been out of the city.

Mr. WILSON. I think he ought to lose it.

Mr. CRESWELL. I think it unjust.

Mr. WILSON. There is no reason on earth why he should vote.

Mr. CRESWELL. I differ from the honorable Senator in that respect.

Mr. WILSON. In all the States there is such a provision as this.

Mr. CRESWELL. No, sir, not in all the States; not in Maryland.

Mr. WILSON. It is possible that the State of Maryland may have so foolish a law as that suggested, but I do not believe any other State has got it. At any rate, I do not think any one ought to vote on a residence of that kind. I am for every man of proper age having the right to vote; but I am for guarding the ballot-box against corruption. If you allow a man to vote on a residence of a year or six months in the District, and there comes a close election, you will find men moving from one ward into another to carry the election. Such a thing ought to be prevented, and therefore I propose to modify the amendment of the Senator from Maine so as to require one year's residence in the district and six months in the ward or precinct where he shall offer to vote. If six months is considered too long, I will say three months. ["Say three months."] Very well; I will adopt that change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine accept the modification of his amendment as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORRILL. It is rather against my judgment. I will not accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to strike out in the eighth and ninth lines of the amendment of the committee the words "six months," and to insert "one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I desire now to offer the amendment that I suggested a moment ago. The section as it now stands requires a residence of one year in the District. I propose to add after the words "one year," which have just been inserted in line eight, section one, the words, "and three months in the ward or election precinct in which he shall offer to vote."

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator that he can accomplish what he desires by moving his amendment in another place. If the amendment is inserted after the eighth line, it will be construed that the person must have lived at the one place a year and three months. I suggest to him to insert after the word "vote" in the eleventh line the words "in the ward or election precinct in which he has resided three months prior to the election." That will accomplish what the Senator has in view; but if it is inserted in the other place it will be construed to mean that the elector must live a year and three months in that place.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator is altogether mistaken in that, but I have no objection to having the amendment inserted where the Senator suggests. If the Senator will read the constitutions of the several States he will find in all of them express words in this form requiring a local residence of so many months.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I move to amend the amendment of the committee in section one, line two, by striking out the word "male" before the word "person."

Mr. President, it is very well known that I have always heretofore been opposed to any change of the kind contemplated by this bill, but while opposing that change I have uniformly asserted that if it became inevitable, if the change was certain, I should insist upon this change as an accompaniment. It is agreed—for I suppose when my honorable friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and myself agree to it, it will be taken to be the universal sentiment of the body—that the right of suffrage is not a natural right, but a conventional right, and that it may be limited by the community, the body-politic, in any manner they see fit and consistent with their sense of propriety and safety.

The proposition now before the Senate is to confer on the colored people of this District the right of franchise; that is, the advocates of the bill say that that will be safe and prudent and proper, and will contribute, of course, to the happiness of the mass of the inhabitants of the District; and they further say that no reason can be given why a man of one color should not vote as well as a man of another color, especially when both are equally members of the same society, equally subjected to its burdens, equally to be called upon to defend it in the field, and all that. I agree to a great portion of that. I do not know and never did know any very good reason why a black man should not vote as well as a white man, except simply that all the white men said, "We do not like it." I do not know of any very good reason why a black woman should not marry a white man, but I suppose the white man would give about the same reason, he does not like to do it. There are certain things in which we do not like to go into partnership with the people of different races and between whom and ourselves there are tribal antipathies. It is now proposed to break down that barrier, so far as political power may be concerned, and admit both equally to share in this privilege; and since the barrier is to be broken down, and since there is to be a change, I desire another change, for which I think there is quite as good a reason, and a little better, perhaps, than that offered for this. I propose to extend this privilege not only to males, but to females as well; and I should like to hear even the most astute and learned Senator upon this floor give any better reason for the exclusion of females from the right of suffrage than there is for the exclusion of negroes. I want to hear that reason. I should like to know it.

Now, for my part, I very much prefer, if the franchise is to be widened, if more people are to be admitted to the exercise of it, to allow females to participate than I would negroes; but certainly I shall never give my consent to the disfranchisement of females who live in society, who pay taxes, who are governed by the laws, and who have a right, I think, even in that respect, at times to throw their weight in the balance for the purpose of correcting the corruptions and the viciousness to which the male portions of the family tend. I think they have a right to throw their influence into the scale; and I should like to hear any reason to be offered why this should not be.

Taxation and representation ought to go hand in hand. That we have heard here until all ears have been wearied with it. If taxation and representation are to go hand in hand, why should they not go hand in hand with regard to the female as well as the male? Is there any reason why Mrs. Smith should be governed by a goat-head of a mayor any more than John Smith, if he could correct it? He is paid by taxes levied and assessed on her property just in the same way as he is paid out of taxes levied on the property of John. If she commits an offense she is subjected to be tried, convicted, and punished by the other sex alone; and she has no protection whatever in any way either as to her property, her person, or to her liberty very often.

There is another thing, too. A great many reflections have been made upon the white race keeping the black in slavery. I should like to know whether we have not partially kept the female sex in a condition of slavery, particularly that part of them who labor for a living? I do not know of any reason in the world why a woman should be confined to two dollars a week when a man gets two dollars a day and does not do any more work than she does, and does not do that which he does do quite so well at all times.

Mr. President, if we are to adventure ourselves upon this wide sea of universal suffrage, I object to manhood suffrage. I do not know anything specially about manhood which dedicates it to this purpose more than exists about womanhood. Womanhood to me is rather the more exalted of the two. It is purer; it is higher; it is holier; and it is not purchasable at the same price that the other is, in my judgment. If you want to widen the franchise so as to purify your ballot-box, throw the virtue of the country into it; throw the temperance of the country into it; throw the purity of the country into it; throw the angel element, if I may so express myself, into it. [Laughter.] Let there be as little diabolism as possible, but as much of the divinity as you can get.

Therefore, Mr. President, I put this as a serious question for the consideration of this body. In the presence of the tendencies of the age and in recognition of this movement, which my honorable friend from Massachusetts is always talking about, and of which he seems to have had premonition long before it came to any of the rest of us—I say in the face of this movement and in recognition of it, I earnestly beg all patriots here to think of this proposition. It is inevitable. How are you to resist when it is made the demand of fifteen million American females for this right, which can be granted and which can be as safely exercised in their hands as it can in the hands of negroes? And I would ask gentlemen while they are bestowing this ballot which has such merit in it, which has such a healing efficacy for all ills, which educates people, and which elevates them above the common level of mankind, and which, above all, protects them, how they will go home and look in the face their sewing women, their laboring women, their single women, their taxed women, their overburdened women, their women who toil till midnight for the barest subsistence, and say to them, "We have it not for you; we could give it to the negro, but we could not give it to you."

How would the honorable Senator from Massachusetts face the recent meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society in Philadelphia? How would he answer the potent arguments which were offered there and which challenge an answer even from the Senate of the United States, when made by women of the highest intellect, perhaps, on the planet, and women who are determined, knowing their rights, to maintain them and to secure them? I ask honorable Senators of his faith how they are to answer those ladies there? If this is refused, how are Senators to answer, especially those who recognize the onward force of this movement, who are up to the tendencies of the times, who desire to keep themselves in front of the great army of humanity which is marching forward just as certainly to universal suffrage as to universal manhood suffrage. Therefore, Mr. President, I offer this amendment and ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

They yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. WILSON. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable and must be put unless withdrawn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 10, 1866.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. KELLEY. Let it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I demand the previous question.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

TENNESSEE HOME GUARDS.

Mr. STOKES submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas Congress on the 28th day of July, 1866, passed an act proposing to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion and for the preservation of the Constitution; whereas in the State of Tennessee there were a number of regiments recruited and mustered into the United States service for the term of twelve months, (known as "Home Guards," who rendered good service; and whereas said law evidently fails in its object to do justice to many of those who bore the burdens; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the justice of said claim, and report by bill or otherwise.

NAVIGATION OF NEWARK BAY, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a resolution of the House of July 27, 1866; which was read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1866.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, at the close of its last session, from the House of Representatives, a resolution passed by it on the 27th of July, 1866, requesting the Secretary of the Navy "to appoint a suitable officer, whose duty it shall be to proceed to Newark, in the State of New Jersey, and examine into the condition of the navigation of Newark bay and the navigation of the mouths of the Passaic and Hackensack rivers, and whether the same needs improvement, and report the result to the House on the first Monday in December next."

This Department has not, as yet, taken any action in pursuance of the resolution as the nature of the surveys and examinations required is such as to lead it to apprehend that the resolution was directed to it by mistake. The survey and examination of our bays and harbors are matters confided to the Coast Survey Office, a branch of the Treasury Department; and it was probably the intention of the House of Representatives that the work contemplated by its resolution should be executed under the auspices of that Department. The Navy Department possesses no facilities for making such surveys and examinations.

Very respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The resolution to which this communication is a reply was offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who is not now in his seat.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the communication be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SHANKLIN asked leave of absence for Mr. LEFTWICH till next Monday.

Leave was granted.

Mr. ORTH asked leave of absence for Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, for two weeks from to-day.

Leave was granted.

MEETINGS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MCINDOE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 830) to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] is entitled to the floor; but when the bill was last under consideration he had yielded temporarily to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I yield to the gentleman from California for so long a time as he may desire.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I join with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] and other members of the House in the desire that some law may be passed giving to the next and each succeeding Congress the power to convene so soon as its existence commences; that is, on the 4th of March. I know of no good reason why so important a branch of the Government should not have in its own hands the power to act in a legislative capacity at any time within the congressional term without being subject to the will of any other branch of the Government, and especially in view of the fact that the President of the United States in his recent annual message has expressed his regret that Congress has not carried out the policy which he indicated in his message of 1865, notwithstanding the fact that that policy has received such emphatic condemnation at the hands of the nation.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself more particularly to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] So far as regards the main features of this bill without this amendment, I am in favor of them; and I should have no objection to the measure if it were so amended as simply to provide that the executives of the several States shall be empowered to fix a time for holding elections, and that if they do not do so the States may hold their elections under the laws of their respective Legislatures. But, Mr. Speaker, the amendment as now offered by the gentleman from Ohio is utterly impracticable, because it proposes that every one of the loyal States shall be represented in Congress on the 4th of March next. All of us would desire this if it were practicable, but under the amendment in its present shape it will be utterly impossible for the State of California to be represented in this House on the 4th of March next, by holding an election on the 22d of February. I do not think that in the time intervening between the 22d of February and the 4th of March, which would be only ten days, the returns of the election could be sent in to Sacramento, the capital of California, so that certificates could be issued to the members who might be elected. Again, sir, from twenty to twenty-eight days would be required for the members to get from California to this city. Therefore it is utterly futile to suppose that under the amendment proposed the State of California could be represented here at the beginning of the session commencing on the 4th of March next.

There must be an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] that as early as the fore part of January there should be an election called, or else it will be utterly impracticable, as I have stated.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio wishes to occupy the floor I will make no further remarks. We have a registry law in our State passed by the Legislature commencing on the first Monday in December, 1865; that Legislature has adjourned, and the next regular session would commence on the first Monday in December, 1867, in two years. That registry law was passed to make preparation for the election to be held on the second Tuesday in September, 1867. There is no election in the State during the year 1866.

My judgment is, if this amendment should be made mandatory on that State as well as upon others, we would find the State of California with not one tenth of her voters prepared to go to the polls and vote at this special election. It would be disastrous. If it be put in the alternative, to put it in the power of the Executive, it would be well. I think, perhaps, the amendment which my friend and colleague holds in his hand will answer the purpose.

But, sir, I shall most cordially vote for this bill as reported without amendment, if we cannot get it, leaving our State to take the risk of having no representation at the first session. I believe it is the duty of Congress to keep together, or to have the power to get together on the 4th of March, and we must suffer the consequences if we cannot be represented. I think the disaster would be greater to force legislation upon the State than to have no representation.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I have since the adjournment of the House had pretty full consultation on this subject, and find that every possible method we have attempted to devise meets with insuperable objections from some one or other. I think, therefore, it would be best for me, with leave of the House, to withdraw my proposition and leave the responsibility with the States which have not elected. I withdraw my proposition.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That section seventeen of the act approved July 23, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," be so amended that no Senator or Representative in Congress, who may be a member of an immediately succeeding Congress, shall receive any allowance for mileage for traveling to the place of meeting to attend the first session of such succeeding Congress.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following, in order to conform the section to the amendment made in the first section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That section seventeen of the act approved July 23, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," be so amended that no Senator or Representative in Congress, who has been a member of Congress next immediately preceding, shall receive any allowance for mileage for traveling to the place of meeting to attend such additional session provided for in the foregoing section.

I understand it to be the disposition of the House to leave this matter of election to the States, either to a special act which might meet the contingency, or to the States themselves.

I suppose there is no other amendment necessary to the bill, and therefore call for the previous question.

Mr. BIDWELL. I ask leave to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

That the regulations of the several States now represented in Congress which have not held elections for Representatives to the Fortieth Congress, to assemble on the 4th of March, 1867, as provided in this act, are hereby so changed and altered as to authorize and empower the Governors of such States to fix a day, which day shall be prior to the said 4th of March, 1867, for the election of such Representatives, and to make all necessary regulations for holding such election within the respective congressional districts, which regulations shall conform, except as to time, as nearly as practicable to existing State regulations, or such regulations as may be prescribed by the State Legislature where the same may be in session: Provided, That if in case the Governor of any State, or the Legislature thereof when in session, shall deem it inexpedient to hold such election prior to the 4th of March, 1867, as aforesaid, then this act shall not operate to invalidate the election, when held in accordance with existing State laws.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my demand for the previous question simply for the purpose of explaining to my friend from California, while I prefer no such amendment should be offered to this bill, it seems to me we have now before the House a proposition to which we are all agreed, and we had better pass it and make it the law of the land. That being done, it strikes me the mode of settling this difficulty of non-representation under the law of some four or five of the States would be to let the members representing those different States meet together and agree on some special act which will provide for the case in each State, or failing to do that, to let them agree if they can to leave it to the existing laws of the State, or failing to do that, to let the representation of each State bring in such bill as will best apply to the condition of things in that State. But I prefer not to legislate in this bill upon that subject, and particularly in this form, where it would seem, in our exercise of power to fix the time for election, we undertake to delegate to the Governors of States the power to repeal the acts of their Legislatures, and at the same time to cover a great deal of ground about which we necessarily know nothing. I prefer, therefore, to leave it to the Representatives of those States, and to aid them in getting through any specific act that will meet their views on the subject. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think there is an omission in this bill which ought to be supplied. The hour of the day for meeting, when the 4th of March comes on Sunday, ought to be fixed for the next succeeding day.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection, if the gentleman thinks it important, to having the amendment made.

There being no objection, the bill was accordingly amended fixing the hour of meeting on the 5th of March at twelve o'clock meridian, when the 4th of March occurs on Sunday.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 29, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, Melndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Rice, Scofield, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—38.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and I avail myself of the opportunity to make a single remark. Some gentlemen apprehend that by the bill as it now stands all constructive mileage is not cut off. My intention was to cut off constructive mileage entirely, so that the members of a preceding Congress who are reelected shall be paid nothing for their transition from one Congress to another, either going or coming. As there has been doubt expressed about that, I will promise gentlemen that I will attract the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom this matter will probably go in the Senate, to this particular point, so that if there be any such construction capable of being given it may be remedied by proper amendment. But I do not think the bill will bear that construction. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, authorized to report at any time, reported back with amendments Senate bill No. 69, to provide for the payment of pensions.

The bill was read. It provides that the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish agencies for the payment of pensions granted by the United States wherever, in his judgment, the public interests and the convenience of the pensioners require, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint all pension agents, who shall hold their offices for the term of four years and until their successors shall have been appointed and qualified, and who shall give bond, with good and sufficient sureties, for such amount and in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may approve, provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to vacate any existing office prior to an appointment by the President as herein provided.

The committee reported the following amendment:

Strike out the words: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to vacate any existing office prior to an appointment by the President as herein provided." And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That the number of pension agencies in any State or Territory shall in no case be increased hereafter so as to exceed three, and that no such agency shall be established in addition to those now existing in any State or Territory in which the whole amount of pensions paid during the fiscal year next preceding shall not have exceeded the sum of $500,000; And provided further, That the President shall within twenty days from and after the passage of this act nominate to the Senate persons for the several agencies in which pension agents have been appointed since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1868, and unless such nominations shall be confirmed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate their offices shall be vacant; and that all pension agents appointed prior to said date last named, and now acting, shall continue in their respective offices until their successors shall be nominated and confirmed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a moment?

Mr. PERHAM. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It appears by the printed bill that I offered this amendment. It is true that I suggested some verbal modifications, but this amendment was proposed by my colleague in front of me, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

The SPEAKER. The amendment is reported by the committee.

Mr. PERHAM. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words:

That the President shall within twenty days from and after the passage of this act nominate to the Senate persons for the several agencies in which pension agents have been appointed since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1866; and unless such nominations shall be confirmed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, their offices shall be vacant;

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the term of office of all pension agents appointed since the 1st day of January, 1866, shall expire at the end of thirty days from the passage of this act, and that the President shall within fifteen days from the passage of this act nominate to the Senate persons for pension agents in the several agencies in which pension agents have been appointed since the 1st day of January, 1866.

So that the amendment will read as follows:

Provided, That the number of pension agencies in any State or Territory shall in no case be increased hereafter so as to exceed three, and that no such agency shall be established in addition to those now existing in any State or Territory in which the whole amount of pensions paid during the fiscal year next preceding shall not have exceeded the sum of $500,000; And provided further, That the term of office of all pension agents appointed since the 1st day of January, 1866, shall expire at the end of thirty days from the passage of this act, and that the President shall within fifteen days after the passage of this act nominate to the Senate pension agents in the several agencies in which pension agents have been appointed since the said 1st day of January, 1866, and that all pension agents appointed prior to said date last named, and now acting, shall continue in their respective offices until their successors shall be nominated and confirmed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. PERHAM. This bill was quite generally discussed when it was up the other day, and I would now call the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. I would ask the gentleman if this bill cannot be so modified as to operate at an earlier day than the 1st of January, 1866?

Mr. PERHAM. The committee was not of the opinion that there was any occasion for that.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELLEY. Would it be practicable now to modify the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would not; the House is operating under the previous question.

A MEMBER. Cannot that be withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. It cannot.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. It cannot be reconsidered while the House is operating under the previous question. It must proceed until the previous question is exhausted. The Clerk will read the rule from page 166.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The previous question may be reconsidered, but not after it is partly executed."

The SPEAKER. It cannot be reconsidered while the House is executing it.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 29, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—117.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Campbell, Cooper, Dawson, Defrees, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hise, Edwin N. Hubbell, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Andrew H. Ward—29.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, Bergen, Chanler, Culver, Davis, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Harris, Hill, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Leftwich, Marston, McCullough, Newell, Noell, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Scofield, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Nelson Taylor, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—45.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

*The bill, as amended, was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Two messages in writing, from the President of the United States, were communicated to the House by Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON, his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution of the House, No. 212, to appoint two managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill certain vacancies.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of privilege, and submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that CHARLES V. CULVER, of Pennsylvania, a member of this House, is detained from his seat in this House under arrest in violation of the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution and of the privileges of this House; Therefore, Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary are hereby instructed, with all practicable dispatch, to inquire into the circumstances of the case and report the same to this House, and to report to this House whether any breach of its privileges has been committed, and what action should be had thereon; that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to sit during the recess of the House, and to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

I desire to say but a word upon this resolution. I have introduced it without any personal knowledge of the facts in the case in question. But I have in my hand an extract I have cut from a newspaper, purporting to give the proceedings of the court upon the case. I ask that the extract be read by the Clerk for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

"PITTSBURG, December 7.—Advices from Franklin, Pennsylvania, say that Hon. C. V. CULVER, of Venango Bank notoriety, held in custody by the civil law, was brought before Judge Thurkey yesterday on a writ of habeas corpus, and asked to be discharged on the grounds that he was a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the twentieth district of Pennsylvania. After able arguments by the counsel on both sides, Judge Thurkey decided to-day that a member of Congress was not entitled to his privilege when held for an indictable offense."

Mr. HALE. Now, if that case is correctly reported in the extract which has just been read, it is evident that it involves a very grave question of privilege, one which affects this House and its dignity as well as the individual immediately interested. I have therefore introduced a resolution taking what seemed to me to be the most advisable course, the one most conformable to the dignity of the House, in order that the Committee on the Judiciary may as soon as possible investigate this whole question and indicate what action should be had. I think it will meet the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to state very briefly to the House the facts in this case, as they have come to my knowledge in a somewhat authentic way. It is but a day or two since I was called upon by some gentlemen from the district of Hon. Mr. CULVER, representing him not only as constituents, but in an official capacity, who presented the whole case to me as they allege it to stand upon the record. Upon their statements, so far as regards the question of privilege, it struck me at once as a very clear one, so clear that, in my judgment, the House would be constrained to act as soon as the facts were brought to its knowledge.

It seems that an action of assumpsit (as it is termed by lawyers) upon a parole contract for the payment of money was instituted against Mr. CULVER, upon a claim amounting to some sixty or seventy thousand dollars. By the law as it stands in Pennsylvania—the act, I think, of 1842 abolishing imprisonment for debt—it is provided that in case the plaintiff in any civil suit shall make an affidavit to the effect that the contract had its origin in fraud or was made upon false and fraudulent representations, the defendant shall not be allowed the privilege of exemption from imprisonment, but shall be required to enter into bonds to answer to the case, and if not able to pay the money to take the benefit of the insolvent law. Gentlemen of the profession here who are conversant with this law will bear me out in the remark that this provision, which was an exceptional one, was only intended as a substitute for the old remedy by capias, which resulted in the exaction of special bail.

On an affidavit of this sort, asserting, as I feel authorized to say from the information I have received, no more than a mere breach of promise or of a contract, a bench warrant was issued in the month of June and during the last session of Congress, upon which Mr. CULVER was arrested, and upon a hearing required to enter into the necessary bond. He declined to do so, or was perhaps unable, for the reason that the sum involved was a very large one. The decision rested on the ground that the circumstances shown constituted a sufficient prima facie case to warrant the exaction of this security under the act of Assembly. An application was thereupon made by Mr. CULVER to the judge of an adjoining district for a writ of habeas corpus, which was accordingly issued. On the hearing of that case, this judge arrived by some means or other at the very sage and very extraordinary conclusion that, inasmuch as fraud was an indictable offense at the common law, the case fell within the constitutional exceptions and was to be considered as a "breach of the peace" within the meaning of that instrument, and therefore refused to grant the discharge. The House will recollect, of course, that the provision referred to is to the effect that Senators and Representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same." The judge in this case holds, as I understand and have already said, that the imputation of fraud involves substantially or by construction of law a criminal offense, although the whole proceeding was nothing more than a civil action for the recovery of a debt, and that Mr. CULVER is not therefore entitled to his discharge upon the ground of privilege; and he is accordingly still held under duress and disabled from attending here to discharge the duties devolved on him by his commission as a Representative.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman mean to say that this was not a criminal proceeding at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. DAWES. Then I do not see how Mr. CULVER can legally be held under arrest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The obligation which he is required to take is that he shall respond to this action, and if he does not pay, shall file his petition for the benefit of the insolvent laws.

It is no more a criminal proceeding than the arrest on original process and the exaction of special bail, for which it is the substitute.

Mr. DAWES. Then it is purely a civil suit? Mr. WILLIAMS. A civil suit; nothing else.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to make one further remark. In an ordinary case, as will be well understood by all the lawyers of this House, a party setting up a defense under a clause of the Constitution of the United States or any act of Congress may have his appeal to the Federal courts, where that defense is overruled. Not so here. In the present case there is no such remedy. The friends of Mr. CUYLER have accordingly come to Washington, as I understand, with the view of making application to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus. Upon a hasty inspection of the acts of Congress providing for the issue of that writ, my conclusion was that jurisdiction could not be exercised by the Supreme Court of the United States in this particular instance. At first view, however, it struck me that it might be expedient to pass an act providing for the special case, and giving that court jurisdiction over it. But upon fuller reflection it has occurred to me that inasmuch as this is the highest court of the nation, its legislative council and the depository of its supreme authority, and as the privileges of Parliament (and those are the privileges of Congress) are transcendent and undefinable in themselves, it would be derogatory to the dignity of this body for us to condescend to have recourse to any other department of the Government to borrow its aid in the assertion of those immunities which are as much privileges of this House, and of the constituent body, as they are of the member individually aggrieved.

I am glad, therefore, that my friend from New York has brought this matter to the notice of the House. I had intended to do the same thing myself, and he has only anticipated me. I trust the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. THAYER. I wish to add only a single word to what has fallen from my colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] The warrant of arrest under which it appears the defendant in this case is held is a substitute in Pennsylvania for the old writ of capias ad respondendum—a form of process by which, before the passage of the act abolishing imprisonment for debt in Pennsylvania, all plaintiffs were at liberty to commence civil actions. It is unquestionably a civil proceeding, and has always been so regarded by the courts of Pennsylvania. I therefore concur entirely with the remarks of my colleague on this subject, and I trust that the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] will be adopted.

Mr. HALE called the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

UNITED STATES TROOPS IN MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In reply to the resolution of the House of the 6th instant, inquiring if any portion of Mexican territory has been occupied by the United States troops, I transmit the accompanying report upon the subject from the Secretary of War.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 8, 1866.

The message, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. SURRATT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States transmitting a report of the Secretary of State relating to the discovery and arrest of John H. Surrott.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask for the reading of the papers.

The SPEAKER. They are very voluminous. Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I do not insist on having them read.

The papers were then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ATCHISON AND PIKE'S PEAK RAILROAD.

Mr. LOAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, required to furnish to this House a statement of the amount of money paid by the United States to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company as assignees of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, or otherwise, for the construction of a branch of the Union Pacific railroad from St. Joseph, Missouri, via Atchison, in Kansas, for one hundred miles west of the Missouri river, and also the time of said payments; also a copy of the reports of the commissioners upon which said payments were made; and also to inform this House whether said road has been surveyed, or located from St. Joseph, Missouri, via Atchison, Kansas, to any point west thereof, and if so, to furnish to this House a copy of such survey and location of such part of said road. And also whether said road or any part thereof was constructed within the time limited by the law granting aid to said road, and if not, by what authority money was paid for the construction of parts of said road after the time limited by law therefor.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, requires unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have some information from the gentleman from Missouri. I think this is an interesting subject. Some one may have been cheated, and I should like to know whom it is.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received.

Mr. LOAN. I understand the franchise granted to the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad was by that company assigned to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company, that that company held the franchise for some considerable time, and after the period limited by the law for the construction of the first twenty miles of that road, they did construct that portion, to wit, that portion running west of Atchison, Kansas, but have neither located nor surveyed any part from St. Joseph to Atchison. I further understand the commissioners have proceeded to examine and make report of the road so far as constructed from Atchison west. I understand that report shows the road to be constructed in an inferior manner, such as will not authorize the payment of the money; but notwithstanding that report, on the promise of the Atchison and Pike's Peak Company to perfect the road, payment on the first twenty miles has been made. I understand the commissioners have examined the second section of twenty miles, and that the matter is pending in the Interior Department. If I understand the law there is no authority for making any payment to the branch road, as the time limited by law has long since expired. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman to say that no part of this road has been made from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Atchison.

Mr. LOAN. None at all, sir. I do not think it has been either surveyed or located.

Mr. STEVENS. When this bill was passed—and as I had some hand in it I therefore remember something about it—we in this House agreed to give to the St. Joseph road a certain subsidy to enable it to go west. When the bill went to the Senate an amendment was made which I never perfectly understood, and I should be glad now to have some explanation of it; the words were inserted "via Atchison," which instead of going west made a short turn at right angles.

Mr. LOAN. That is the road via Atchison. Mr. STEVENS. Does not the gentleman understand it was intended "via Atchison" should mean to begin at Atchison?

Mr. LOAN. I really do not, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the resolution will be passed, so that we may have a little more light on this interesting subject.

Mr. LOAN demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LOAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS S. LYON.

Mr. THAYER, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Private Land Claims Senate bill No. 373, releasing to Francis S. Lyon the interest of the United States in certain lands in the State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and proceed to the consideration of the President's annual message.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the subject of freedmen and freedmen's affairs be referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the subject of the Atlantic telegraph be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the subject of levees be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the coinage and weights and measures of the United States be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

MR. STEVENS. I yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who desires to say a few words on the subject.

MR. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, the popular elections of 1866 have decided that the lately rebellious States shall not be readmitted to the privilege of representation in Congress on any less stringent condition than the adoption of the pending constitutional amendment; but those elections have not determined that the privilege of representation shall be given to those States as an immediate consequence of adopting the amendment. In that respect the decision of the loyal people has been rather negative than affirmative; expressive of the least that would be accepted rather than indicative of the most that might be demanded. Had the southern States, after the adjournment of Congress, accepted the amendment promptly and in good faith, as a definitive basis of adjustment, the loyal States would have indorsed it as such, and the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress would have been largely engaged in perfecting the details for the full and complete representation of all the States on the new basis of apportionment.

The southern States, however, have not accepted the amendment as a basis of adjustment, but have on the other hand vehemently opposed it; every one of them that has thus far acted on the question, with the exception of Tennessee, having defiantly rejected it. This absolute and obdurate refusal on the part of those States to accept the amendment as the condition of their regaining the privilege of representation certainly relieves Congress from whatever promise or obligation may have been originally implied in regard to admitting them to representation in consequence of adopting the amendment. [This promise, or implication, or whatever you choose to term it, was, by universal understanding, conditioned on the southern States accepting the amendment in good faith, as was significantly illustrated in the case of Tennessee. Having refused so to accept it, the promise, if ever made, is assuredly no longer binding on the Congress of the United States.]

But even if the constitutional amendment should be definitely accepted, South as well as North, as the condition on which the rebel States should regain the privilege of congressional representation, the actual enjoyment of that privilege would of necessity be postponed until the terms of the amendment could be complied with; and that would involve a somewhat uncertain period of time. For I take it for granted, as I did when I voted for the constitutional amendment, and as I presume every other gentleman on this floor did, that we were not to be guilty of the supreme folly of declaring that the basis of representation was so unfair as to require correction by constitutional amendment, and then forthwith admit the southern States to the House with their undue and inequitable share of Representatives. If the constitutional amendment is to effect a correction in the basis of representation, it should effect it at once. If the southern States are to be deprived of their undue share of representatives, based on their non-voting population, they should be deprived of them at once, and not be admitted, even temporarily, with the old apportionment, by which they would continue to exercise in the House of Representatives and in the Electoral Colleges the same weight of influence enjoyed by them before the rebellion.

The population of the States recently slaveholding was by the census of 1860 only 12,240,000, of whom 8,039,000 were whites and 4,201,000 negroes. The population of the free States by the same census was 19,201,546, of whom only 237,000 were negroes. It would hardly be maintained by any one that the late slaveholding States, taken as a whole, have done anything more than hold good their population of 1860, while in the free States, despite the losses of the war, the ratio of increase has never been more rapid than since that year. It is speaking with all moderation to say that the population of the free States is to-day 25,000,000.

Supposing the constitutional amendment to be adopted, therefore, as the basis of readmitting the southern States to the privilege of representation, it would be a cruel mockery of the whole aim and intent of that amendment to usher those States upon this floor with the full number of Representatives assigned them by the census of 1860, when three fifths of their slaves and all their disfranchised free people of color were allowed them in fixing the basis of apportionment. Were they so admitted to-day, the aggregate number of Representatives from the late slave States would be eighty-five, and from the free States one hundred and fifty-six—making a House of two hundred and forty-one in all. And yet if those two hundred and forty-one members were divided between the free and slave States on the basis of the representative population as directed by the constitutional amendment, the slave States would have but fifty-eight members, while the free States would have one hundred and eighty-three.

A corresponding change would be wrought in the Electoral Colleges. Were the Government to permit an election for President and Vice President in 1868 on the basis assigned by the census of 1860, the late slave States would have 115 electoral votes, while the free States would have 198. But on the actual basis contemplated by the constitutional amendment the late slave States would have but 88, while the free States would have 225. On the old basis the free States would thus have a majority of 83, while on the basis of the constitutional amendment they would have a majority of 127; a net difference of 44 electoral votes in favor of the free States.

In view of these results, which are the plainest arithmetical deductions, it could not be expected that the free States, even if they were to adhere to the constitutional amendment as the ultimatum of adjustment, would consent to have the lately rebellious States admitted to representation here and to a participation in the Electoral Colleges until the relative and proper strength of the several States should be adjusted anew by a special census and by an apportionment made in pursuance thereof. It was in this belief and with these views that at the last session of Congress I framed a bill providing for a special enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, which bill was on my motion referred to the reconstruction committee, and has never been reported upon either favorably or adversely.

What then shall be done? The people, so far as I represent them, have plainly spoken in the late elections, and the interpretation of their voice is not difficult. They have pronounced with unmistakable emphasis in favor of the constitutional amendment with the superadded and indispensable prerequisite of manhood suffrage. The constitutional amendment with its definition of American citizenship, with its guarantee of the national obligations, and with its prohibition of the assumption of the rebel debt, is an invaluable addition to our organic law. We cannot surrender its provisions, and the rebel States cannot by their utmost resistance defeat its adoption. It is too late to deny or even to argue the right or power of the Government to impose on those States conditions precedent to their resumption of the privilege of representation. The President set the example by exacting three highly important concessions from those States as his basis of reconstruction. Congress followed by imposing four other conditions as its basis of reconstruction, if you please, and now the people have spoken demanding one additional condition as their basis of reconstruction, and that condition is the absolute equality of American citizens in civil and political rights without regard to caste, color, or creed.

The objection in the popular mind of the loyal States to the constitutional amendment as a basis of final adjustment is not directed to what that amendment will effect, but to what it will not effect. And among the objects of prime importance which it will not effect is the absolute protection of the two classes in the South to whom Government owes the most, namely, the loyal white men and the loyal black men. The amendment, if made the basis of final adjustment without further condition, leaves the rebel element of the South in possession of the local governments, free to persecute the Union men of all complexions in numberless ways, and to deprive them of all participation in civil affairs; provided they will submit to a curtailed representation in Congress as the penalty. The danger is that they would accept the comparatively small infliction on themselves in order to secure the power of visiting the loyalists with a full measure of vengeance; just as certain religious denominations in England at various times under the reign of the Stuarts favored measures of proscription which bore with some hardship on themselves, because they were enabled thereby to punish some rival and hated sectaries with still more severity and cruelty.

Among the most solemn duties of a sovereign Government is the protection of those citizens who, under great temptations and amid great perils, maintain their faith and their loyalty. The obligation on the Federal Government to protect the loyalists of the South is supreme, and they must take all needful means to assure that protection. Among the most needful is the gift of free suffrage, and that must be guaranteed. There is no protection you can extend to a man so effective and conclusive as the power to protect himself. And in assuring protection to the loyal citizen you assure permanency to the Government; so that the bestowal of suffrage is not merely the discharge of a personal obligation toward those who are enfranchised, but it is the most far-sighted provision against social disorder, the surest guaranty for peace, prosperity, and public justice.

MR. WENTWORTH. Unless some other person wants to go on to-day, I would like to move that the committee rise so as to retain the floor.

MR. STEVENS. First let the resolutions be passed. That will still leave the message open to discussion, and will not deprive the gentleman of the floor.

The question being taken on resolutions, they were adopted.

MR. WENTWORTH. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the President's annual message, and had directed him to report certain resolutions to the House.

The resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole were then adopted.

CHARLES M'CARTHY.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Charles McCarthy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

INDIANS IN NORTHERN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the care and maintenance of the Indians in northern California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ARMY APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill so amending section four of the act to increase the military peace establishment of the United States, approved July 28, 1860, as to permit and authorize the appointment of persons who have served five years or more in the Army, and who have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to be excused from serving on the committee appointed to visit New Orleans. I have just taken my seat in this Congress only a few days ago. I represent a district that has had no Representative here for six years. I have a great deal of business to do during this short session, and if I go to New Orleans it will be impossible for me to give that attention to the interests of my constituents that I think they require.

The gentleman was accordingly excused from service.

FEES AND COSTS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

Mr. DODGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire now to call up the special order, being the bill for the regulation of appointments and removals from office. I merely do it for the purpose of saving the bill and allowing it to retain its place.

The SPEAKER. It will retain its place on the Calendar at any rate, there being no other special orders.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all I desire.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. DARLING. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to inquire into frauds on the revenue, &c., be authorized to employ a clerk for such time as they may deem necessary, and that all the expenses of said committee be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better word his resolution differently, so as to provide that the committee be authorized to employ a stenographer as clerk. They will probably need a stenographer.

Mr. DARLING. We can employ a stenographer under the rules of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No you cannot. If the gentleman desires to accomplish his object he had better modify his resolution.

Mr. DARLING. I will modify it so as to read "a clerk and stenographer." We may want both.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to that. The committee will have no need for a clerk if they have a stenographer.

Mr. DARLING. Then I will modify the resolution so as to authorize the employment of a stenographer as clerk.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

VOTES RECORDED.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to record my vote on the passage of the bill in regard to the meetings of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The chair cannot, under the rules, ask unanimous consent for that purpose. It requires a suspension of the rules.

Mr. JULIAN. I move, then, to suspend the rules to enable me to record my vote.

The question was taken, and two thirds voting in favor thereof the rules were suspended.

Mr. JULIAN. I vote "ay."

Mr. ELIOT. I desire the same privilege, and move a suspension of the rules for that purpose.

The question was taken, and two thirds voting in favor thereof the rules were suspended.

Mr. ELIOT. I vote "ay."

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I desire to record my vote on the same bill, and move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The question was taken, and two thirds voting in favor thereof the rules were suspended.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I vote "ay."

Mr. NICHOLSON. I desire the same privilege, and move that the rules be suspended.

The previous question was taken, and two thirds voting in favor thereof the rules were suspended.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I vote "no."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Edgar T. Harris. They are simply his discharge papers. A law has been passed under which they are no longer needed here.

No objection was made, and leave was granted for the withdrawal of the papers.

And then, on motion of Mr. GRINNELL, (at five minutes past three o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 11, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received, and will take this opportunity to lay before the Senate, the memorial of Henry M. Buell, of Hopkins, Alleghany county, Michigan, late of the forty-first regiment Ohio volunteers. The memorialist describes himself as having served for a long period during the rebellion, and having been discharged on account of disability contracted in the service. On account of his extreme poverty he has not been able to get together the proof necessary to procure a pension; and he asks Congress to make him a grant of land from the public lands. The memorial will be received if there be no objection, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

It was so referred.

Mr. HOWARD presented the petition of Mary M. Taylor, praying that certain land on the island of St. Helena, in the parish of St. Helena, State of South Carolina, may be delivered to her upon payment of the taxes due the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of officers in the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of the marine underwriters in the city of New York, praying for an appropriation of money sufficient to remove the iron steamship Scotland, wrecked on the bar outside of Sandy Hook; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Harriet G. Peale, Rosalba P. Underwood, and John H. Griscom, executors of the estate of the late Rembrandt Peale, artist, praying for an appropriation for the purchase of Mr. Peale's painting now in the Rotunda entitled "Washington before Yorktown;" which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. NESMITH, it was Ordered, That the memorial and papers of the heirs of Benjamin R. Milam, praying for the confirmation of their title to a tract of land granted by the Mexican Government to him, and land scrip for so much of the land as has been disposed of by the United States, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 459) suspending the payment of moneys from the Treasury as compensation to persons claiming the service or labor of colored volunteers or drafted men, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The tariff bill which passed the House at the last session was referred by a vote of the Senate to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report on the second Monday in December, if I recollect rightly. The committee have as yet been unable to take up the bill for consideration so as to report on the day named. We intend, however, to report it at as early a day as possible after we have examined it. In the mean time the bill is pretty much out of print, and I move that five hundred additional copies of the bill be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion by unanimous consent. It is moved that five hundred additional copies of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that ten thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Public Lands be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion by unanimous consent. Under the rule the motion must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SUMNER. I presume it will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RAMSEY. I imagine it will go to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. YATES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Mary Stanley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what additional legislation is necessary to provide for the succession of the President's office in case of the death or disability of all those upon whom it may now devolve by the Constitution or the laws, and to report by bill or otherwise.

VOLUNTEER BREVETS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending to officers in the late volunteer service who are appointed to positions in the regular Army the same benefits of brevets conferred, of length of service, and in all other respects, which are allowed officers of the regular Army who accepted positions in the volunteer service in consequence of their services in such volunteer positions.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 830) to fix the times for the regular meetings of Congress was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes; and a bill (H. R. No. 848) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home," approved July 25, 1866; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 327) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharine F. Winslow; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 848) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home," approved July 25, 1866—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, and no motion is interposed, the Chair, although the morning hour has not expired, will call up the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] to strike out the word "male" before the word "person" in the second line of the first section of the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose that the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced this amendment rather as a satire upon the bill itself, or if he had any serious intention it was only a mischievous one to injure the bill; but it will not probably have that effect, for I suppose nobody will vote for it except the Senator himself, who can hardly avoid it, and I, who shall vote for it because it accords with a conclusion to which I have been brought by considerable study upon the subject of suffrage.

I do not contend for female suffrage on the ground that it is a natural right, because I believe that suffrage is a right derived from society, and that society is competent to impose upon the exercise of that right whatever conditions it chooses. I hold that the suffrage is a delegated trust—a trust delegated to certain designated classes of society—and that the whole body-politic has the same right to withdraw any part of that trust that we have to withdraw any part of the powers or the trusts that we have imposed upon any executive officer, and that it is no more a punishment to restrict the suffrage and thereby deprive certain persons of the exercise of that right who have heretofore exercised it, than it is a punishment on the Secretary of the Treasury if we should take from him the appointment of certain persons whose appointment is now vested in him. The power that confers in each case has the right to withdraw.

The true basis of suffrage of course is intelligence and virtue; but as we cannot define those, as we cannot draw the line that shall mark the amount of intelligence and virtue that any individual possesses, we come as near as we can to it by imperfect conditions. It certainly will not be contended that the feminine part of mankind are so much below the masculine in point of intelligence as to disqualify them from exercising the right of suffrage on that account. If it be asserted and conceded that the feminine intellect is less vigorous, it must also be allowed that it is more acute; if it is not so strong to strike, it is quicker to perceive. But at all events it will not be contended that there is such a difference in the intellectual capacity of the sexes as that that alone should be a disqualification from the exercise of the right of suffrage. Still less will it be contended that the female part of creation is less virtuous than the masculine. On the contrary, it will be conceded by every one that morality and good order, religion, charity, and all good works appertain rather more to the feminine than to the masculine race.

The argument that women do not want to vote is no argument at all, because if the right to vote is conferred upon them they can exercise it or not as they choose. It is not a compulsory exercise of power on their part. But I think that argument is partly disproved by the convention to which the Senator from Pennsylvania referred yesterday, whose arguments he said were worthy of consideration even in this Chamber. I think they are, and I think it would be very difficult for any one in this Chamber to disprove them.

Nor is it a fair statement of the case to say that the man represents the woman in the exercise of suffrage, because it is an assumption on the part of the man; it is an involuntary representation so far as the woman is concerned. Representation implies a certain delegated power and a certain responsibility on the part of the representative toward the party represented. A representation to which the represented party does not assent is no representation at all, but is adding insult to injury. When the American Colonies complained that they ought not to be taxed unless they were represented in the British Parliament, it would have been rather a singular answer to tell them that they were represented by Lord North, or even by the Earl of Chatham. The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who say that the States lately in rebellion are entitled to immediate representation in this Chamber would hardly be satisfied if we should tell them that my friend from Massachusetts represented South Carolina and my friend from Michigan represented Alabama. They would hardly be satisfied I think with that kind of representation.

Nor have we any more right to assume that the women are satisfied with the representation of the men. Where has been the assembly at which this right of representation was conferred? Where was the compact made? What were the conditions? It is wholly an assumption. A woman is a member of a manufacturing corporation; she is a stockholder in a bank; she is a share-holder in a railroad company; she attends all those meetings in person or by proxy, and she votes, and her vote is received. Suppose a woman offering to vote at a meeting of a railroad corporation should be told by one of the men "we represent you, you cannot vote," it would be precisely the argument that is now used; that men represent the woman in the exercise of the elective franchise. A woman pays a large tax, and the man who drives her coach, the man who waits upon her table, goes to the polls and decides how much of her property shall go to support the public expenses, and what shall be done with it. She has no voice in the matter whatever; she is taxed without representation.

The exercise of political power by women is by no means an experiment. There is hardly a country in Europe—I do not think there is any one—that has not at some time of its history been governed by a woman, and many of them very well governed, too. There have been at least three empresses of Russia since Peter the Great, and two of them were very wise rulers. Elizabeth raised England to the very height of greatness, and the reign of Anne was illustrious in arms and not less illustrious in letters. A female sovereign supplied to Columbus the means of discovering this country. He wandered footsore and weary from court to court, from convent to convent, from one potentate to another, but no man on a throne listened to him until a female sovereign pledged her jewels to fit out the expedition which "gave a new world to the kingdoms of Castile and Leon." Nor need we cite Anne of Austria, who governed France for ten years, or Marie Theresa, whose reign was so great and glorious. We have two modern instances. A woman is now on the throne of Spain, and a woman sits upon the throne of the mightiest empire in the world. A woman is the high admiral of the most powerful fleet that rests upon the seas. Princes and nobles bow to her, not in the mere homage of gallantry, but as the representative of a sovereignty which has descended to her from a long line of sovereigns, some of the most illustrious of them of her own sex. And shall we say that a woman may properly command an army, and yet cannot vote for a common councilman in the city of Washington?

I know very well this discussion is idle and of no effect, and I am not going to pursue it. I should not have introduced this question; but as it has been introduced, and I intend to vote for the amendment, I desire to declare here that I shall vote for it in all seriousness because I think it is right. The discussion of this subject is not confined to visionary enthusiasts. It is now attracting the attention of some of the best thinkers in the world, both in this country and in Europe, and one of the very best of them all, John Stuart Mill, in a most elaborate and able paper, has declared his conviction of the right and justice of female suffrage. The time has not come for it, but the time is coming. It is coming with the progress of civilization and the general amelioration of the race, and the triumph of truth and justice and equal rights.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, to extend the right of suffrage to the negroes in this country I think is necessary for their protection; but to extend the right of suffrage to women, in my judgment, is not necessary for their protection. For that reason, as well as for others, I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and for the amendment as it was originally introduced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] Negroes in the United States have been enslaved since the formation of the Government. Degradation and ignorance have been their portion; intelligence has been denied to them; they have been proscribed on account of their color; there is a bitter and cruel prejudice against them everywhere, and a large minority of the people of this country to-day, if they had the power, would deprive them of all political and civil rights and reduce them to a state of abject servitude. Women have not been enslaved. Intelligence has not been denied to them; they have not been degraded; there is no prejudice against them on account of their sex; but, on the contrary, if they deserve to be, they are respected, honored, and loved. Wide as the poles apart are the conditions of these two classes of persons. Exceptions I know there are to all rules; but, as a general proposition, it is true that the sons defend and protect the reputation and rights of their mothers; husbands defend and protect the reputation and rights of their wives; brothers defend and protect the reputation and rights of their sisters; and to honor, cherish, and love the women of this country is the pride and the glory of its sons.

When women ask Congress to extend to them the right of suffrage it will be proper to consider their claims. Not one in a thousand of them at this time wants any such thing, and would not exercise the power if it was granted to them. Some few who are seeking notoriety make a feeble clamor for the right of suffrage, but they do not represent the sex to which they belong, or I am mistaken as to the modesty and delicacy which constitute the chief attraction of the sex. Do our intelligent and refined women desire to plunge into the vortex of political excitement and agitation? Would that policy in any way conduce to their peace, their purity, and their happiness? Sir, it has been said that "the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world;" and there is truth as well as beauty in that expression. Women in this country by their elevated social position can exercise more influence upon public affairs than they could coerce by the use of the ballot. When God married our first parents in the garden according to that ordinance they were made "bone of one bone and flesh of one flesh;"

and the whole theory of government and society proceeds upon the assumption that their interests are one, that their relations are so intimate and tender that whatever is for the benefit of the one is for the benefit of the other; whatever works to the injury of the one works to the injury of the other. I say, sir, that the more identical and inseparable these interests and relations can be made, the better for all concerned; and the woman who undertakes to put her sex in an adversary position to man, who undertakes by the use of some independent political power to contend and fight against man, displays a spirit which would, if able, convert all the now harmonious elements of society into a state of war, and make every home a hell upon earth.

Women do not bear their proportion and share, they cannot bear their proportion and share, of the public burdens. Men represent them in the Army and in the Navy; men represent them at the polls and in the affairs of the Government; and though it be true that individual women do own property that is taxed, yet nine tenths of the property and the business from which the revenues of the Government are derived are in the hands and belong to and are controlled by the men. Sir, when the women of this country come to be sailors and soldiers; when they come to navigate the ocean and to follow the plow; when they love to be jostled and crowded by all sorts of men in the thoroughfares of trade and business; when they love the treachery and the turmoil of politics; when they love the dissoluteness of the camp and the smoke and the thunder and the blood of battle better than they love the affections and enjoyments of home and family, then it will be time to talk about making the women voters; but until that time the question is not fairly before the country.

Negroes are a distinct class of people; they are distinguished from others by their color, and that color is generally regarded as a badge of inferiority, and that idea of inferiority subjects them to injustice. Suppose, sir, they are allowed to vote, who will be harmed? Suppose a white man goes to the polls and is followed there by a negro, what injury or harm results from that brief and conventional association? Sir, that same white man can go to the polls and be followed by a traitor, a thief, or a drunkard, without any supposed degradation; but if he is followed by a man whose complexion is black, though he may be as honest and upright a being as God ever made, there some imaginary disgrace is made to be the consequence.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that much of this feeling, strong as it is, difficult as I know it is to conquer, is mere prejudice, the result of the educational influences to which we have been subjected by the institution of slavery. People in other countries where slavery has never existed do not cherish the prejudice against the negro that exists in this country. Sir, I have seen negroes as slaves sitting on the same seat in the same coach and conveyance with white people without objection; but when that identical black man becomes free then his presence in a coach or a conveyance is very obnoxious to the same white person. Is not the negro as black as a slave as he is as a free man? Is he not as odious and offensive in every way as a slave as he is as a free man? Nobody will pretend that there is any change in the person; but slavery makes a negro agreeable while freedom makes him odious and hateful. That is all there is about it.

I dismiss, so far as I am concerned in connection with this question, all theories as to the natural rights of persons to vote, and I put my action in favor of this bill upon the plain, practical ground that suffrage to the negro in this country is necessary for his protection. Sir, to insult and abuse a negro in this District is the pastime of some of its inhabitants. If there is anything that I hate and despise, anything that makes my blood boil with indignation, it is to see a man conscious of his superiority and power insult and abuse one whose color or whose circumstances place him beyond the reach of public sympathy or the pale of the law's protection. Sir, it is "base flattery to call such a man a coward." Yesterday we were told that the descendants of dignified, haughty, and proud families lived in this District. I am aware of that fact, and for that reason I desire to extend the right of suffrage, so that all the descendants of those dignified, proud, and haughty families may enjoy it.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if he knows who wrote that article.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What article do you refer to?

Mr. COWAN. The article to which the Senator is referring now, setting forth that the inhabitants of this District were descended from proud and aristocratic families, and all that kind of thing. I wish to ask him whether he knows that that was written in the interest of impartial suffrage or whether it was written against it. Every one knows that it is very easy for a man to write an article of that kind and have it inserted in the public papers for the purpose of being read here and producing a sensation. Now, if the honorable Senator knows anything about this thing, knows anything about the authenticity of that newspaper article and who wrote it, what the purpose for which it was written was, it is proper that he state it. If not, it is very improper to make use of it. I can very readily see how a man who desired to prejudice a cause, to damage it, should go about and insert in newspapers, under the eye of stupid editors, articles of this kind which were calculated to do immense mischief; and yet, how correct it? If the authenticity of this article which so much prejudices the people of this District is known, if it is by authority, if it has their sanction, let us know it; otherwise it is mere idle wind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I know nothing of the article to which I have referred, except that it was introduced and read yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and is before the Senate; and I am surprised to find the Senator's indignation aroused by a mere allusion to it by me, when he listened yesterday to its reading without any question. I do not know, sir, who is the author of that article; I know that it appeared, or purports to have appeared, in a paper that, as I understand, professes to be published in Georgetown, while it is actually published in the city of Washington, for the purpose of avoiding a law of Congress passed at the last session and to secure from the hands of the President the executive patronage; and I understand that it is a paper that is opposed to suffrage in this District.

Now, is it probable that a paper laboring to defeat suffrage in this District would publish an article suggested by the enemies of that paper, or the friends of suffrage, for the purpose of producing injury? I referred to that article because it was before the Senate. I was about to say, in reference to the descendants of those proud, haughty, dignified families, that I can see no reason why one portion of them should not enjoy the right of suffrage as well as the others simply because they are not quite as fair as their more fortunate connections.

One, and the chief objection made to this bill is that negroes are not sufficiently intelligent to exercise the right of suffrage. I have to say that they possess intelligence enough to distinguish between their friends and their enemies. They have intelligence enough to distinguish between the friends and enemies of the country. Does it take any more intelligence to know where to stand in the political controversies of the day than it did to know where to stand, on which side, during the late convulsion in this country? Sir, the people of the United States are divided into two great political parties. Suppose the negroes should be invested with the right of suffrage and should attach themselves to the Democratic party. I presume the honorable Senator would not claim that their ignorance in that way would do the country any particular harm. Suppose they should attach themselves to the Republican or Union party, then their votes in my judgment would only strengthen the loyal and patriotic sentiment of the country. They would undoubtedly belong to one or the other of these parties.

Sir, I remember that when it was proposed to emancipate the slaves it was said that such a policy would pour a flood-tide of ignorance and barbarism upon the country that would cause its ruin. When it was proposed to give negroes the right to be witnesses in a court of justice a similar objection was made. Men trusted these negroes in the ordinary transactions of life; trusted their word; trusted them with the charge of their property and affairs; but when a negro crossed the threshold of a court of justice to tell there what he had seen and heard then it was assumed that he had no more capacity or integrity than a dog! When it was proposed to make him a soldier this same outcry was made, and so step by step the prejudices against this class of people have been broken down, and it is legitimate reasoning to conclude that if suffrage is extended to these negroes no more evil will follow from that than from the other acts by which they have been advanced and improved in this country. Let us try this experiment. I believe that it will be found advantageous to all concerned. To pretend to have a Government founded upon the consent of the governed, to pretend to have a Constitution that recognizes the inalienable right of man to life, liberty, and property, and then to deny to millions of citizens in this country any part of that consent, any power to protect their life, liberty, and property, is an inconsistency upon which a republican Government can hardly stand.

Let us, sir, extend to these people these rights which they claim and which I think they ought to possess, and vindicate, as I have no doubt we shall, that the surest and safest and best foundation for republican institutions is equal and exact justice to all men.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I have only to add that the honorable Senator from Oregon might have concluded his speech by saying "and to all women," because he has not been using the word "man" as a generic term, as that which includes mankind, but he has been arguing for the male especially.

Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything on this subject beyond what I offered to the Senate yesterday evening, and I should not do so if it were not for the suggestion of a friend, and I am glad to say a friend who believes as I do, that it is the general supposition that I am not serious and not in earnest in the amendment which I have moved; and I only rise now for the purpose of disabusing the minds of Senators and others from any impression they may have had of that sort.

I am perfectly free to admit that I have always been opposed to change. I do not know why it is. Whether I have felt myself old or not, I have not ranged myself in the category of "old fogies" as yet. Although I feel an indisposition to exchange the "ills we suffer" for "those we know not of," and am not desirous to launch myself away from that which is ascertained and certain, and adventure myself upon a sea of experiment, at the same time I feel as much of that strength, that elasticity, that vigor, and that desire for the advancement of my race, my countrymen, and my kind as anybody can feel. I yield to no one in that respect. All I have asked, and all I have desired heretofore, is that we go surely. I believe with my fathers and my ancestors that to base suffrage upon the white males of twenty-one years of age and upward was a great stride in the world's affairs; that it would be well for the world if its government could progress, could advance upon that basis, and that all the rest of the world who did not happen to be white males of the age of twenty-one years and upward could very well afford to stand back and witness the effect of our experiment.

I was of that opinion, I lived in the light of it, and I rejoiced in its success; and when I saw this rebellion, when I witnessed the differences of opinion which convulsed this part of the continent, when I saw the fact that one half of the United States was upon the one side and the other half upon the other side as to the understanding of the true theory of this Government of ours, simple as it may be to the lawyer, complex as it may be when examined more thoroughly, I was more than ever disinclined to widen the suffrage, to intrust the franchise to a larger number of people. I trembled for the success of the experiment; I hesitated as to where it would end. I may say, Mr. President, that I hesitate yet. The question is by no means settled, the difficulty is by no means ended, the controversy is by no means yet concluded.

But the first step taken, from the very initiative of that step, I have announced my ground and my determination. When a bill was up here before proposing to enlarge and widen the franchise in this District, I stated that if negroes were to vote I would persist in opening the door to females. I said that if the thing was to be taken away from the feudal realms and from feudal reasons, which went on the idea that the man who bore arms, and he alone, was entitled to the exercise of political power, and if it was to be put upon the ground of logic, and if we were to be asked to give a reason for it, and if we were to be compelled to give that reason, I said then, and I say now, "If I have no reason to offer why a negro man shall vote I have no reason to offer why a white woman shall not vote." If the negro man is interested in the Government of the country, if he cannot trust to the masses of the people that the Government shall be a fair and just Government and that it shall do right to him, then the woman is also interested that this Government shall be fair to woman and fair to the interests of woman. Why not, Mr. President? Are not these interests equal to those of the negro and of his race?

I know it has been said that the woman is represented by her husband, represented by the male; and yet we know how she has been represented by her husband in by-gone times; we know how she is represented by her barbarian husband; and let him who wants to know how she is represented by her civilized husband go to her speeches made in the recent woman's rights convention. We know how she has been represented by her barbarian husband in the past and is even at the present. She bears his burdens, she bears his children, she nurses them, she does his work, she chops his wood, and she grinds his corn; while he, forsooth, by virtue of this patent of nobility that he has derived, in consequence of his masculinity, from Heaven, confines himself to the manly occupations of hunting and fishing and war.

I should like to hear my honorable friend from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] so apt, so pertinent, so eloquent on all questions, discourse upon the title which the male derives in consequence of the fact that he has been a fisher and a hunter and a warrior all the time; and then I should like to know how he would discriminate between that fisher and hunter and warrior and those Amazons who burnt their right breasts in order that they might the more readily draw the bow and against whose onset no troops of that day were able to stand. I should also like to know from him how it was that the female veterans of the army of Dahomey recently, within the last three or four years, in the face of an escarpment that would have made European veterans, ay, and I might say American veterans, tremble, scrambled over that escarpment and carried the city sword in hand.

Now, Mr. President it is time that we look at these things, and that we look them full in the face. I am always glad and willing to stand upon institutions, to stand upon institutions that have been established in the past, that have been sanctified by time, that have given to men liberty and protection with which they were satisfied. But, sir, when the time comes that we are to make a step forward, then another and different question arises. I am utterly astonished at my honorable friend from Rhode Island who doubted my sincerity in this movement. Why should I not be sincere? Have I not as many interests at stake as he has? Ay, and one more, because I understand he is a widower, and I have a wife in full life. Why should I not be in earnest?

I beg my honorable friends, especially on my right, to remember that Radicals are not in the same category with poets. Poets are born; poeta nascitur, non fit; but Radicals fit, they are made, and when the time comes I am a Radical, too, along with my fellow-Senators here. By what warrant do they suppose that I am not interested in the progress of the race? Do they suppose that I am more desirous of Tophet than they are, that I love diabolism better than they do? That is an arrant presumption that nobody—I was going to say no honest man—would make; I will say no fair politician would make. If the thing is to be bettered, I want to better it. The question is how. I have hesitated; I have held back; I have doubted, and all that kind of thing; but I am told that the matter is settled now, the verdict of the country at the late election has determined that there shall be progress. Well, what is that progress to be? I am not disposed to be a martyr. However earnestly I might worship before the shrine of Juggernaut, I have no disposition to lie down and allow his car to run over me and crush me beneath its ponderous wheels. The simplest instincts of common sense would teach a man better than that.

Now, that my seriousness, my earnestness, and my sincerity should be questioned, and especially by a caleb, in this case, is most extraordinary, and I have no doubt that my friend from Rhode Island, when he comes for a moment to reflect upon it, will offer the most ample apology, which I am free to state here in advance that I am willing to receive. [Laughter.]

My honorable friend from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] thinks this is entirely preposterous. I have no doubt he does, and I give him all credit for honesty and sincerity in the remarks that he has made; but the trouble with him is, and with a great many others—perhaps it is with myself upon some subjects—is that he directs his gaze too long upon a particular point. It is remarkable that when a man who looks long and steadily upon one subject to the exclusion of every other, that subject at last becomes to him the universe itself. I have met fellow-politicians, fellow-Senators, and fellow-coworkers in the great battle of life, who really had so long contemplated one subject that it was not within their capacity to see any others.

I agree that my brother from Oregon is a fit exponent of the wrongs of the negroes. He has looked upon that subject, he has examined it in all its length and breadth, he knows it in detail. I have only to say to him that if he would look upon the miseries of any other portion of the human family, if he would look, for instance, on the miseries of Senators, and concentrate his gaze upon them, think of the enormous amount of "boring" they have to undergo, think of the enormous amount of worrying they have to submit to, and think of the troubles of this, that, and the other kind which attend upon a Senator's life, I have no doubt he might be extremely eloquent in depicting them, and might, perhaps, do some good by deterring young Americans from adventuring in such a career as it furnishes to them in the vista of human enjoyment.

There is no situation in life which is exempt from these things; and the only fault I have to find with his speech is in the fact that he concentrates himself entirely upon the African; he confines his gaze to him; he supposes that he is the only injured man in the world; and what is singular about it, he confines his gaze to him upon this continent. If he had turned back to the last book of Dr. Livingstone and to the last book of Mr. Baker and to the last accounts we have of Africa generally, he might have come to the conclusion that however bad and wicked the American people were in taking this race from Africa and making them slaves, yet that in reality they had made them better than they were at home. The King of Dahomey upon his inauguration was expected to sacrifice seven thousand slaves as a great ovation, as a great immolation in favor of the sovereignty of that nation and its accession to him; and when he came to the conclusion that he would only sacrifice three thousand and that he would sell the other four thousand in order to raise the expenses of the pageant, perhaps the Senator on full consideration thinks that the king was not such an inhuman fellow after all, and that clearly those four thousand slaves who were sold away to America to be brought in contact with Christianity, to be brought in contact with anti-slavery societies, and with the efforts of anti-slavery people, and with the efforts of godly people to train them in the way of life, and to furnish them with tracts and Bibles and all those things which would enable them to reach a better world, that these four thousand were far better off than the three thousand other poor devils who had their heads cut off to furnish a ceremony for a king's pageant and for an inauguration day. I say that all these things ought to be taken into the account by my honorable friend from Oregon that his view might be widened a little.

But it unfortunately happens that in this world there are others besides the negro who suffer. When you have told of the injuries and outrages which prevail on the earth in regard to the negro you have not finished. Another, and in my judgment a much more important personage, comes upon the scene; she lifts the curtain and reveals to you a new drama, and she tells you distinctly that you have not only been tyrannizing over your brother, your sable brother, your brother at the other end of the national antipodes, your troublesome antipathic brother; you have not only been drenching the earth from the East to the far West with the blood of savages of a different color from yours; you have not only left your blood-stained marks in Japan, in China, in the East Indies, everywhere, and in the West where one of your Christian bishops boasted that six million Mexicans at one time had been sacrificed, and what for? To make them Christians; to make the rest Christians after the six millions had gone. I say this new personage who makes her appearance upon the drama of human affairs informs you that you and your religion, under the conduct of the male, generative, fecundative principle of the sex, have filled the world with blood from one end to the other of it. What for? To give her liberty. She complains to-day; she complains in your most intelligent high places; she complains in your most refined cities; she complains in your halls decorated with a more than Grecian beauty of architecture; she complains where all of past civilization, all of past adornment, and all of past education comes down to satisfy us that we stand upon the very acme of human progress; she complains that you have been tyrant to her.

Mr. President, let me read from the proceedings of the twenty-ninth annual meeting of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society. I propose to read from the remarks of Mrs. Gage, a woman, a lady, a lady of brain and intellect, of courage and force; and whether I am in earnest or not, whether I may be charged with being serious or not, no man dare charge Mrs. Gage with not being serious. I will read from Mrs. Gage, therefore:

"Mrs. Francis D. Gage said: 'I have read speeches and heard a great deal said about the right of suffrage for the freedmen.'

So have we all, Mr. President; and the probability is that we have been even more afflicted—if that can be said to be a punishment, and there is very great difficulty now to ascertain what is punishment in this world. If that can be said to be a punishment, I think this Senate can with at least equal propriety with Mrs. Gage complain of its extraordinary infliction upon them without any previous trial and conviction. [Laughter.]

"What does it mean? Does it mean the male freedman only, or does it mean the freedwoman also? I was glad to hear the voice of Miss Anthony in behalf of her sex."

I am glad, Mr. President, that we have a male of that name in this body who emulates the virtues of his more humble sister, [laughter,] and stands up equally here for the broad rights of humanity as she does.

"I know it is said that this is bringing in a new issue."

Yes, that is what was said about me yesterday evening. Gentlemen said it was a new issue; we had not talked about this thing here before; nobody had thought about it. Why had nobody thought about it? Because nobody was thinking about the actual, real sufferings which human beings were subjected to in this world. Persons thought about such things just in proportion as they reflected themselves upon their future political career. If it became necessary in order to elect a dozen Senators to this body this winter, that the women should be treated as women ought to be treated, that they should be put upon an equal footing with the men in all respects and enjoy equal rights with men, then I should have great hopes of carrying my amendment and carrying it in spite of everybody, because then and in that light it would be seen by Senators, and they would be thereby guided.

"I know it is said that this is bringing in a new issue. We must bring in new issues."

Now, I want to know what the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] will say when he finds me advocating this new issue that must be brought in while he lags behind. My honorable friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] will have immensely more the advantage of him to-day than he had yesterday if he dares lag, because I put the question to him now distinctly, and I do not leave it to his sense of propriety as to whether he shall speak or not speak on this question; I demand that he do speak. I demand that that voice which has been so potential, that voice which has had so much of solemn, I do not say sepulchral, wisdom in it heretofore, shall now be heard on the one side or the other of this important question, which involves the fate, the destiny, the liberty of one half of the people who inhabit this continent. I know from the generous upswelling of the bosom, which I almost perceive from here, in my brother, that he will respond to this sentiment, and that the response will be one of which his State and her progress, having two negroes in the Legislature now, [laughter,] will be proud. I feel assured of it, and I feel that when suffering humanity in any shape or form, whether it be male or female, whether it be black or white, red or yellow, appeals to him, the appeal will not be in vain, but that he will come to the rescue, and that he will strike the shield of the foremost knight on the other side and defy him to the combat.

"We must [said Mrs. Gage] bring in new issues. I sat in the Senate Chamber last winter."

And now I beg pardon of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] for any offense that I may do to his modesty; but when I come to consider the recent change which has taken place in his life and habits I am the better assured that he will endure it. At any other time, I should not have dared to introduce this quotation.

"I sat in the Senate Chamber last winter, [said Mrs. Gage. Last winter, remember!] and heard CHARLES SUMNER's grand speech, which the whole country applauded."

And, Mr. President, they did, too, and they did it properly. It was a great, a grand, and a glorious speech; it was the ultimate of all speeches in that direction; and I, too, applauded with the country, although I, too, might not have agreed in every part of the speech. I might not have agreed with the speech in general, but it was a great, grand, proud, high, and intellectual effort, at which every American might applaud, and I pardon Mrs. Gage for the manner in which she speaks of it. She has not excelled me in the tribute which I offer here to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and which I am glad to lay at his feet.

"I sat in the Senate Chamber last winter, and heard CHARLES SUMNER's grand speech while the whole country applauded; and I heard him declare that taxation without representation was tyranny to the freedman."

That was the ring of that speech; that was its key-note; it was the same key-note which stirred his forefathers in 1776; it was the same bugle-blast which called them to the field of Lexington and Bunker Hill ninety years ago; and it is no wonder that Mrs. Gage picks that out as being the residuum, that which was left upon her ear of substance after the music of the honorable Senator's tones had died away, after the brilliancy of his metaphors had faded, after the light which always encircles him upon this subject had gone away. It is no wonder that all that remained of it was that taxation without representation was tyranny. Let me commend it to the honorable Senator with his keen eye, his good taste, his appreciation of that which is effective and that which strikes the American heart to the core; let me commend it to him who desires to be the idol of that heart.

"When"—

Now, Mr. President, sic transit gloria mundi—

"When I afterwards found that he meant only tyranny to the male sex, I learned that CHARLES SUMNER fell far short of the great idea of liberty."

All this outpouring, all this magnificent burst of eloquence, all this eclectic combination drawn from all the quarters of the earth, all the sublime talk about the ballot, was merely meant for the question of trousers and petticoats! "Tyranny to the male sex," says Mrs. Gage, and now she goes on, and this is right to the point. The proposition here is to give to the male freedman a vote and to ignore the female freedwoman, to be tautological.

"I know something of the freedwomen South, Maria—I do not know that she had any other name—when liberated from slavery at Beaufort went to work and before the year was out she had laid up $1,000."

That is a magnificent Maria, that is a practical Maria. She puts Sterne's Maria and all other Marias, except Ave Maria, in the shade. [Laughter.]

"I never heard of any southern white making $1,000 in a year down there. Shall Maria pay a tax and have no voice?"

Shall Maria pay a tax and have no voice where the principle is admitted, where the principle is thundered forth, where it is axiomatic, where none dare gainsay it, that taxation without representation is tyranny? "Shall Maria pay a tax and have no voice?" That is the question. That, Mr. President, is the question before the Senate.

"Old Betty!"

There is not so much of the classic, not so much of the euphonious, not so much of the salva rosa about Betty as about Maria—

"Old Betty, while under my charge, cleared more than the amount free from taxation, and I presume is worth $3,000 to-day."

Think of Betty!

"Is she to be taxed in South Carolina to support the aristocracy?"

Betty lives in South Carolina, it seems.

"Will you be just, or will you be partial to the end of time?"

"The marriage relation was alluded to by Miss Anthony."

And here is a most important part, to which I would direct the attention of my brother Senators as fundamental, fundamental in two respects—fundamental in the testimony it furnishes of the character of those you now propose to invest with the right of suffrage, fundamental in its character as to the use which they will make of it as to one half of the people who are in this bill presumed to be the objects of your especial care:

"The marriage relation was alluded to by Miss Anthony. When the positive order was sent to me to compel the marriage of the colored people living together, the women came to me with tears and said, 'We don't want to be married in the church, because when we are married in the church our husbands treat us just as old massa used to, and whip us if they think we deserve it; but when we ain't married in the church they knows if they tyrannize over us we go and leff 'em.'

That is the class of male gentlemen to whom you propose to give suffrage. These poor women who have to be whipped if the males think they deserve it are the people to whom you deny it. These are the gentlemen who are to fabricate and make your laws of marriage, who are to fix the causes of divorce in these several States. These are the men, in other words, who are to enact, if it so please them, that upon the marriage the husband becomes seized of all his wife's property, of the personalty absolute and the realty as tenant by the courtesy; or perhaps they will have no courtesy about it—and I should not wonder if they had not—and give it to him in fee.

"And the men?"

I beg the Senate to remember that I am reading the testimony of Mrs. Gage; unexceptionable testimony:

"And the men came to me and said: 'We want you to compel them to be married, for we can't manage them unless you do.'"

I am not certain whether they can always be managed even after they are married. [Laughter.] But this is worse a great deal than before.

"They goes and earns just as much money as we does, and then they goes and spends it and never asks no questions. Now we wants 'em married in the church, 'cause when they's married in the church we makes 'em mind.' So in San Domingo establishing the laws of marriage made tyranny for these redeemed slave women."

Mrs. Gage continues:

"I would not say one word against marriage. God forbid. It is the noblest institution we have in this country. But let it be a marriage of equality. Let the man and woman stand as equals before the law. Let the freedwoman of the South own the money she earns by her own labor, and give her the right of suffrage; for she knows as much as the freedman. Bring in these elements, and you will achieve a success. But I will stand firmly and determinedly against the oppression that puts the newly-emancipated colored women of South Carolina under the subjection to her husband required by the marriage laws of South Carolina. I demand equality on behalf of the freedwoman as well as the freedman."

I might follow Mrs. Gage further; I might detain the Senate here hour after hour reading extracts from the various speeches and essays which have been delivered and made upon this subject within the last few years, and I may again make the challenge which I made yesterday. Let us have a reason why these are not potent to influence our action. Let us be told wherein the object of this argument is defective. Let us be shown why it is, if these things are rights, natural or conventional, that those who have interests are not to participate in them.

I listened to the eloquent and ingenious remarks of my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL]—old, time-worn, belonging to the region of paleontology, far behind the carboniferous era. I would not undertake to go back there and answer them. All I can do with them is to refer them to the next meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society, which more than likely will meet in Albany or Boston the next time. There they will be attended to, and there they will be answered in such satisfactory phrase, I have no doubt, as would pale any poor effort of mine on the attempt. I have also listened to my honorable friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and still there are the same ancient foot-prints, the same old arguments, the same things that satisfied men thousands of years ago and which never did satisfy any woman that I know of, the same traveling continually of the tracks of the lion into the cave along with his victim, and nulla retrorsum vestigia, not a step ever came back. But let me say to my friends that Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Mrs. Frances D. Gage, Miss Susan B. Anthony are upon your heels. They have their banner flung out to the winds; they are after you; and their cry is for justice and you cannot deny it. To deny it is to deny the perpetuity of your race.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to this District and this city, here is a fair proposition. It proposes to confer upon all persons above the age of twenty-one years the right to participate in the city government. Is any one afraid of it? Is my honorable friend from Maine afraid of it? He says it shall be confined to the males. He and my friend from Oregon have gone on to tell you that the white males of this city are in a very bad condition, indeed some of them in such a terrible condition that we are called upon to pass a bill of attainder, or a bill of pains and penalties, and a little ex post facto law in order to reach their tergiversations and perverseness. If that be true, why not incorporate some other element? I do not know much about the female portion of the negroes of this District except what I have seen, and I must confess that although there are a great many respectable persons among the negroes, and many for whom I have considerable regard, yet as a mass they have not impressed me as being a very high style of human development.

When I look along the pavements and about the walks and see them lounging, I am free to say that, without having been previously enlightened on the subject by so much as we have heard upon it recently, I should have had great doubts about conferring on them the right of suffrage. And when I reflect that they have to have a Freedmen's Bureau to make their contracts for them and to keep them in order, and it is said to protect them against the enmity of their white neighbors, even where they have a majority, or nearly a majority, I am not strengthened in my partiality for them by that. And when I reflect that just about this time last year we had great hesitation about adjourning for fear that the people represented by these males who are now to be invested with the franchise were in an actually starving condition in this District, and that the chief authorities of the District, moved, I have no doubt, by that humanity which ought to characterize everybody, investigated the matter and reported to us, we were obliged to appropriate $25,000 to relieve them in their immediate wants; I do not think that speaks so well for the male portion of the African population of this city.

I believe if it were to come to the last resort that the female Africans of the District of Columbia have more merit, more industry, more of all that which is calculated to make them good and virtuous members of society than the males have. Why should you not throw them in? Why should you throw this batch of males into the ballot-box without any countervailing element which would be efficacious to qualify it and make it better?

To me it is perfectly plain. I have reconciled my mind to negro suffrage, but while I reconcile myself to negro suffrage as inevitable, I hold it to be my bounden duty to insist upon female suffrage at the same time. I am happy to say that in this opinion I am not alone; that while I favor universal suffrage limited by the age of twenty-one years so far, there are others who have been led to this same train of thought with myself. I beg, therefore, to read a letter dated Jefferson, Ohio, November 14, 1866:

MADAM: Yours of the 9th instant is received, and I desire to say in reply that I am now and ever have been the advocate of equal and impartial suffrage to all citizens of the United States who have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, who are of sound mind, and who have not disqualified themselves by the commission of any offense, without any distinction on account of race, color, or sex. Every argument that ever has been or ever can be adduced to prove that males should have the right to vote applies with equal if not greater force to prove that females should possess the same right; and were I a citizen of your State I should labor with whatever of ability I possess to ingraft these principles in its constitution.

Yours, very respectfully, B. F. WADE.

To SUSAN B. ANTHONY, Secretary of American Equal Rights Association.

Now, Mr. President, I ask whether this has not an orthodox sanction at least. I should like to know who would question, who would dare to question, the orthodoxy of the honorable Senator from Ohio, and who dares tell me that this is such a novelty that it is not to be introduced here as serious, as in earnest? Sir, I say that I am perfectly in earnest, and I say that if this amendment be incorporated in this bill I shall vote for it with all my heart and soul. I beg to be understood that I would not inaugurate the movement, I would not make the change by my own mere motion, because I would not venture upon the change anywhere. That change must rise out of, spring out of, and come up from society generally. It is that thing which the poet has called the vox populi, and which he likens to the vox Dei. When the community spontaneously demands this call, when the community spontaneously demands this action, I yield to it. It is so in this instance. While I yield to the demand for negro suffrage, I demand at the same time female suffrage; and when I yield to the question of manhood suffrage, I feel assured I throw along the antidote to all the poison which I suppose would accompany the first proposition.

I am not afraid of negro suffrage if you allow female suffrage to go hand in hand with it. I believe that if there is any one influence in the country which will break down this tribal antipathy, which will make the two races one in political harmony and political action, not in actuality as races by amalgamation, but which will induce that harmony and that co-operation which may bring about the highest state, perhaps, of social civilization and development, it is the fact that woman and not man must interfere in order to smooth the pathway for these two races to go along harmoniously together. And it is for that reason that I insist that when you do make this step, this step forward which once made can never be retrieved, you must do that other thing which assures its success after it is made. Let the negro male vote now, and you open the arena of strife and contention; let both sexes vote, and then you close that arena of strife, you bring in that element which subdues all strife, which has made America what she is, which has made the American political meeting, which has made the American political convention, not the scene of strife or angry contention, where armed men met together to settle political differences, as in the Polish Diet, but a convention where all were subjected to reason, influenced, as it might properly be, by eloquence and by that "feast of reason" which is "the flow of the soul" to those who enjoy it. And therefore, Mr. President, I beg to assure everybody, and especially my honorable friend from Rhode Island, who agrees with me, I know, upon this topic, that I am serious and in earnest in urging this amendment; in dead earnest, in good earnest, and why not? I am not so blind as to mistake the signs of the times.

I might have refused to believe long ago when my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. WADE] predicted that this was coming. I might have disbelieved when my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] predicted this was coming; when he blew his bugle blast and announced what an army was coming behind to enforce his doctrine and his principles. I might, like Thomas of old, have doubted; but now I have had my fingers in the very wounds of which he spoke. I know of a certainty now that this movement is in progress and that this movement will go on. I know of a certainty that black men must vote in the District of Columbia. Who can doubt it? Those who are in favor of that measure here are in force sufficient to carry it constitutionally beyond all question. Well, if it is to be I am reconciled to it, but at the same time I want to throw about it as many safeguards as are possible under the circumstances, and among those safeguards I think that of allowing females suffrage to be not only the best but the only one which will be efficacious in this behalf.

Mr. President, I have trespassed a great deal longer upon the Senate than I intended. I beg to return my thanks for the indulgence they have exhibited in listening to what I had to say.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the honorable Senator began by saying that he was in earnest, and he concludes by affirming the same thing. Doubtless he had made the impression upon his own mind that after all he had said there might be a doubt in the minds of the Senate on that point. Does any one who has heard the speech, somewhat extraordinary, of the honorable Senator suppose that he is, at all in earnest or sincere in a single sentiment he has uttered on this subject? I do not imagine he believes that any one here is idle enough for a moment to suppose so. Now, his attempt at being facetious has not been altogether a failure. I think he has succeeded in being amusing; he has evidently amused himself; and if he could afford the sacrifice I admit he has amused the galleries and probably most of us; but that he has convinced anybody that he was arguing to enlighten the Senate or the public mind on a question which he says is important, he does not believe and he does not expect anybody else to believe it. If it is true, as he intimates, that he is desirous of becoming a Radical, I am not clear that I should not be willing to accept his service, although there is a good deal to be repented of before he can be taken into full confidence. [Laughter.]

When a man has seen the error of his ways and confesses it, what more is there to be done except to receive him seventy and seven times? Now if this is an indication that the honorable Senator means to out-radical the Radicals, "Come on, Macduff," nobody will object provided you can show us you are sincere. That is the point. If it is mischief you are at, you will have a hard time to get ahead. While we are radical we mean to be rational. While we intend to give every male citizen of the United States the rights common to all, we do not intend to be forced by our enemies into a position so ridiculous and absurd as to be broken down utterly on that question, and who ever comes here in the guise of a Radical and undertakes to practice that probably will not make much by the motion. I am not surprised that those of our friends who went out from us and have been feeding on the husks desire to get ahead; but I am surprised at the indiscretion and the want of common sense exercised in making so profound a plunge at once! If these gentlemen desire to be taken into companionship and restored to good standing, I am the first man to reach out the hand and say, "Welcome back again, so that you are repentant and regenerated;" but sir, I am the last man to allow that you shall indorse what you call radicalism for the purpose of breaking down measures which we propose!

So much for the radicalism of my honorable friend. Now, sir, what is the sincerity of this proposition? What is the motive of my honorable friend in introducing it? Is it to perfect this bill? Is it to vindicate a principle in which he believes? Not a bit of it. It is the old device of the enemy—If you want to defeat a measure, make it as hateful and odious and absurd as possible and you have done it. That is the proposition. Does he believe in the absolute right of women to vote? Not a bit of it, for he has said here time and again in the beginning, middle, and end of his discourse that he does not believe a word of it.

Mr. COWAN. And never did.

Mr. MORRILL. He says it is no natural right whatever either to man or woman and therefore he does not stand here to vindicate a right.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator whether he believes it is a natural right either in man or woman.

Mr. MORRILL. I have said distinctly on a former occasion that I did not; and therefore I am not to be put in the attitude of so arguing. The Senator does not believe that; he is not here urging a principle in which he believes. What is he doing? Trying to do mischief; trying to make somebody believe he is sincere. That is labor lost here. It will not succeed of course.

Now, what is his position? "I do not believe in woman suffrage, and do not believe in negro suffrage, but if you will insist upon male negro suffrage I will insist upon woman negro suffrage." That is his position exactly. "If you insist that the male negro shall vote I insist the female shall." That is his attitude; nothing more nor less. Mr. President, I do not think there is much force in the position. He has not offered an argument on the subject. He has read from a paper. He has introduced here the discourse of some ladies in some section of the country upon what they esteem to be their own rights, in illustration; that is all; not as argument; he does not offer it as an argument, but to illustrate his theme and to put us in an attitude, as he supposes, of embarrassment on that subject. He has read papers which are altogether foreign from his view of this subject, and which he for a moment will not indorse. He offers these as an illustration with a view of illustrating his side of the question, and particularly with a view of embarrassing this measure.

I think that is all there is in the Senator's proposition, and so I leave it. But while I am up I will advert, to save calling the attention of the Senate to it again, to that part of his argument yesterday which was addressed to the amendment proposed to the bill whereby those who had been engaged in rebellion were to be restricted in this right. My honorable friend is an astute and able and critical lawyer, and when he talks law here he is bound to talk as a lawyer; he ought to talk as a lawyer; but he will allow me to say that all his talk on that subject was not lawyer-like; he did not talk in the language of the law, he did not talk on the principles of the law, the fundamental, cardinal principles of the law; he did not talk even the ordinary principles common to the very tyros of the law. He undertook to convince the Senate that you could not do this thing because it would be ex post facto, absolutely against the Constitution of the United States, as it would inflict a punishment on the man who was deprived of the exercise of the right to vote. On what principle, allow me to ask the honorable Senator, would that be true?

Mr. COWAN. Go on; I will show when you get through.

Mr. MORRILL. You are coming! Well, sir, is it a punishment in the nature of a penalty to say that a man who has enjoyed a privilege shall no longer enjoy it? That is all there is of this. On the argument of the honorable Senator, the right of voting is not a natural right; it is one which society confers or withholds as it pleases. It confers it upon just whom it will and withholds it from whom it will. There being no right of course there is no punishment. The honorable Senator talked upon that subject as if we were inflicting a penalty and a punishment by simply saying that those persons who had gone out from among us and engaged in treason, rebellion, civil war, insurrection, and had forfeited all rights, shall not hereafter be intrusted with the exercise of certain civil and political rights! That I insist is a perfect answer to all that my honorable friend said on that subject yesterday. It is not a penalty; it is not a punishment in the sense of punishment; it is simply saying to those who have by their conduct forfeited the confidence of the community, "You may no longer exercise that trust." That is all there is of it. So my honorable friend will pardon me for saying that I think with all his conceded brilliant attainments in the law, his great ability and learning and acuteness, he did not talk in the language of the law when he was up yesterday.

Mr. President, I had no intention of detaining the Senate when I rose.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything further, but I certainly did not suppose that I should be assailed by the honorable Senator from Maine upon the subject of my law; and particularly I did not suppose that he, the champion as he supposes of his wing of the party, would do it. He says that to deprive a man of the right of suffrage is not a punishment. Is it not a punishment when you make it a punishment, when you say that you do it by way of punishment and you tell why you do it? But he gets off on the shallow sophism that it not being a natural right society may take it away from a man. If the honorable Senator had been disposed to argue fairly as a lawyer always is—the very essence of a lawyer is that he is always fair, always manly, always right up to the point—he would have remembered that yesterday I distinguished between his case and mine. He says voting is not a natural right; it is conventional; it is bestowed by society; and if it is bestowed by society, cannot society take it away? I say certainly society can take it away; but what I said here was that society cannot take it away unlawfully; I said that the Constitution of the United States which was made to restrain us the same as laws are made to restrain the citizen forbids it, and I say you cannot take it away here until you alter the Constitution of the United States. You cannot in this way deprive the humblest American citizen of any right. Before God, if there is anything in my country of which I am proud it is that no power in the country can deprive the humblest American citizen of his humblest right in the face of the law, because in this country the law is sovereign, not the Congress, not the President, not the court, but that silent, terrible vox populi of the American people which we find in the Constitution.

I admit that if the honorable Senator proposes to change the Constitution he can limit the right of suffrage to whomsoever he pleases; he can deprive of it people who have been in the rebellion and people who have not been in the rebellion; he can deprive of it anybody. But this is not the function that he aspires to perform here. He proposes here upon the floor of the Senate, and in the face of the American Senate, sworn to stand upon the Constitution and the laws, to deal with an American citizen in this District, an American citizen owing direct and personal allegiance beyond all question, despite John C. Calhoun, despite Webster, and despite everybody. Nobody dare deny that the allegiance is direct and personal in the District. This man, like the tyrant of old who would have scourged Paul, comes here and proposes to deprive an American citizen of a right by way of penalty, by way of punishment, for what? Because he says he took part in the rebellion. Does he propose to try him? No, sir, he does not propose to try him. He proposes no intervention by a grand jury of this man's neighbors who are to be the judges of the testimony, of its truth, of the probability of the facts. He proposes no petit jury, no judge learned in the law, none of the safeguards of American liberty. He tramples upon them all, runs right over them all, and proposes to punish an American citizen, and says it is no punishment. I say, Mr. President, as I said yesterday, that Caligula was a mild, humane tyrant compared to this.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. If this is in the nature of punishment because it denies to a citizen of the United States a right, is it in the nature of punishment to deny that right to the colored citizen?

Mr. COWAN. I will answer that; and it is astonishing to me that gentlemen with the legal as well as literary acumen of the honorable Senator from Maine cannot see the distinction. I have said over and over again that in this bill of his allowing suffrage to the colored people he may pick out any number of them and exclude any number, because thereby he deprives nobody of any right; and even if he did he would not be doing it by way of punishment. The essence of the thing which he proposes to do, of which I complain, is that he proposes to deprive certain people of their rights which they have under the law, and he gives as reason for it that they have committed a crime. What can be plainer than that?

Mr. MORRILL. No such thing. We say simply because they cannot be trusted; that is all.

Mr. COWAN. I know what the honorable Senator simply says, and I know what anybody may simply say, but that does not alter the thing. You cannot make that which is punishment to be not punishment by merely saying "I do not intend it as a punishment." That will not do. The thing is a punishment, and I have the highest authority for saying so. I have that authority here before me. At one time there was a motion made in the other House to inquire of Mr. Webster how he disposed of the secret service money of the Government, and in the debate which followed upon that occasion John Quincy Adams, than whom I suppose no man could be higher authority as a learned man, as a jurist, as a statesman, as among the head and front of men of whom American citizens are proud, said that the deprivation of the right of suffrage he considered the highest punishment that could be inflicted upon a man; and yet here in the broad light of day, in the open Senate, among the élite of American men, if there be such a thing, a Senator gets up and asserts that this thing which would sting an honorable man to the quick, which would debase and degrade him, which would stigmatize his children, which would wound him beyond the pangs of death, in the language of John Quincy Adams, that this is no punishment. Why, Mr. President, it is impossible to carry the absurd and the ridiculous beyond that.

No punishment! No punishment to ostracize a man! No punishment to deprive a man of that right, the highest and the holiest, and most sacred which the law has cast upon him! No punishment to deprive him of it! Mr. President, it is the highest punishment known to the law even when it is inflicted by due process of law! Was it no punishment to the Sepoy that if he bit off the end of a greased cartridge he should become a pariah, that he should be thrown out from his caste, that he should be disqualified among his sect? It was that which made the recent rebellion in India. Talk about its being no punishment! To say that it is no punishment is to insult the commonest, plainest principles of our reason. It is to suppose that a man is destitute of nerves; it is to suppose that feeling within him has been paralyzed and made incapable of being wounded by any indignity.

Mr. President, I am sorry that it has been necessary for me to argue this question. I agree with gentlemen that this is within the control of the community. I have said so. I say that the community of Pennsylvania by a convention of her people, or by the legal mode pointed out in her constitution for its amendment, may deprive large classes of citizens of their franchise, and there is no punishment in it, there is no disgrace in it; but I declare to-day that the Legislature of Pennsylvania cannot with all its sovereignty and with all the rights conferred upon it take away from the humblest citizen of Pennsylvania his right to the franchise by way of punishment and because he has been guilty of any offense.

Mr. President, I have only to recall to the recollection of the Senate, and especially to the recollection of the honorable Senator from Maine, that which transpired at the last session. A question arose in this body whether it were competent for Congress to deprive those who had taken an active part in the recent rebellion of their right of suffrage. What lawyer ever had any doubt upon that question? And what was it that drove the committee of reconstruction, in order to avoid the difficulty and to overcome the barrier interposed by the Constitution, to resort to a constitutional amendment? If the third clause, I believe it is, of that constitutional amendment could have been enacted by Congress, where was the necessity for making it a constitutional amendment? Only that necessity which was recognized by all lawyers who said that under our Constitution it would be in the nature of a bill of pains and penalties which was forbidden; or in another aspect of it, it would be an ex post facto law, imposing a penalty for a crime which had been before that time committed; and therefore it was that the high prerogative of sovereignty exercised by the American people in the amendment of their Constitution was invoked to avoid that very difficulty. Now, I ask the honorable Senator from Maine if this was a thing not in its nature penal, not partaking of the character of punishment, within the ordinary scope of legislative action, why was it that rebels were not disfranchised simply by act of Congress? Why was it necessary to resort to an amendment of the Constitution to achieve it? I can state to the honorable Senator that it was because of the legal sense of his compeers; it was the weight of the obligations of the Constitution upon his compeers which compelled them to resort to that mode of achieving the purpose which he now proposes to achieve in the face of the Constitution.

Well, now, Mr. President, I desire to answer another question of the Senator. He alleges that I am not serious in the amendment I have moved, that I am not in earnest about it. How does he know? By what warrant does he undertake to say that a brother Senator here is not serious, not in earnest. I should like to know by what warrant he undertakes to do that. He says I do not look serious. I have not perhaps been trained in the same vinegar and persimmon school, [laughter;] I have not been doctrinated into the same solemn nasal twang which may characterize the gentleman, and which may be considered to be the evidence of seriousness and earnestness. I generally speak as a man, and as a good-natured man, I think. I hope I entertain no malice toward anybody. But the honorable Senator thinks that I want to become a Radical. Why, sir, common charity ought to have taught the honorable Senator better than that. I think no such imputation, even on the part of the most virulent opponent that I have, can with any justice be laid to my door. I have never yielded to his radicalism; I have never truckled to it. Whether it be right or wrong, I have never bowed the knee to it. From the very word "go" I have been a conservative; I have endeavored to save all in our institutions that I thought worth saving.

I suppose, in the opinion of the gentleman, I have made sacrifices; I suppose I am in the condition of Dr. Caius: "I have had losses." Certainly, if any man has given evidence of the sincerity of his doctrines, I have done so; I have lost all of that, perhaps, which the Senator from Maine may think valuable; I have lost all the feathers that might have adorned my cap by opposition to radicalism; and now I stand perfectly free and independent upon this floor; free, as I supposed, not only from all imputation of interest, but free from all imputation of dishonor. I am out of the contest. If I had chosen to play the Radical; if I had chosen to out-Herod Herod, I could have out-Heroded Herod perhaps as well as the honorable gentleman, and I could have had quite as stern and vigorous a following as he or any other man, more than likely without asserting any very large amount of vanity to myself, [Mr. MORRILL rose;] but now, when I stand here, as I think, free, unquestionably free from all imputation either of interest or dishonor, to be told this is— If the Senator wants to say anything, I will hear him.

Mr. MORRILL. The honorable Senator will allow me to say that I do not think this line of argument is open to him, because to-day once or twice he certainly repeated that this was a race of radicalism and he did not intend to be outdone. My remark was predicated simply on the assumption of the honorable Senator that he was disposed to enter into the race, and rather in a disposition to welcome than discourage him.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I agree that if you will allow the gentleman to put arguments in my mouth and to furnish me theories as his fancy paints them, he can demolish them. I will not agree that he is my master in any particular; but I do agree that he can take a pair of old pantaloons out in the country and stuff them and make a man of straw, and that he can overthrow it and trample upon it and kick it about with the utmost impunity. But I do not choose to allow the honorable Senator to make either my theories or my arguments, nor do I allow him to make quotations from me unless he does it fairly. I gave utterance to no such idea as that which he has just attributed to me. I did not say that in this race of radicalism I was determined to be in front. I said no such thing. I said that there was an onward movement, that I yielded to that movement, and that while I yielded to it against my own better opinion that any change was impolitic; yet that change was inevitable, I wanted it to be as perfect as possible and I wanted it to be made with all the safeguards possible.

That was my argument. I said so yesterday, I said so to-day; I say so now; and I appeal to my friends here who have talked about this onward movement, this progress of things, this inevitable which was in the future, to stand now upon their theories and upon their doctrines. That was my ground, ground simply stated, and for that I am not to be charged here with a desire to conciliate the honorable gentleman or his faction or his party, or any other party in this country. Mr. President, I am not a proud man, I hope; not a vain man, I hope; but I would rather be deprived of the right of suffrage, high punishment as it is, I would rather suffer all the penalties that would be inflicted even by the most malignant law-giver than to cower or cringe or yield to anything of mortal mold on this planet, except by duress and by force. No man dare charge me with that. I have endeavored to act here as an honest man feeling his own responsibilities, feeling the responsibilities of the oath upon him when he took it; obliged to interpret the Constitution as he himself understands it; feeling that that Constitution was a restraint upon him, a restraint upon the people, a restraint upon everybody; that we were sent here for the purpose of standing upon it even against the rage of the people, even against their desire to trample it under foot. Feeling all these things, I have stood here and I appeal to my fellow-Senators to know if any one of them can say that at any time I have manifested the smallest disposition to yield in any one particular. I scorn the imputation; I would rather have the approval of my own conscience, I would rather walk in the star-light and look up to them and to the God who made me free and independent, than to seek the highest station upon the earth by truckling to any man or any set of people or giving up my free opinions.

And yet I propose not to be irrational in this matter. As I said yesterday, and as I said to-day, I have struggled against change; but if it is to be made I wish to direct it properly. I made in my own person, two or three years ago, a motion which passed this body by, I think, a vote of precisely two to one—I believe it was 28 to 14—that the voters of the District of Columbia should be confined to white males; but upon that occasion I stated—and the debates will bear me out, I think—that if the door of the franchise was to be opened, if it was thought that the safety of the country required more people to cast ballots, more people to enjoy this privilege, I would open it to the women of the country sooner than I would open it to the negroes. I say so to-day. You are determined to open it to the negroes. I appeal to you to open it to the women. You say there is no danger in opening it to the negroes. I say there is no danger then in opening it to the women. You say that it is safe in the hands of the negroes. I say it is equally safe in the hands of our sisters, and more safe in the hands of our wives and our mothers. I say more to you. I say you have not demonstrated that it is safe to confer the franchise upon men just emerged from the barbarism of slavery; I say you have not demonstrated that it is safe to give the ballot to men who require a Freedmen's Bureau to take care of them, and who it is not pretended anywhere have that intelligence which is necessary to enable them to comprehend the questions which agitate the people of this nation, and of which the people are supposed to have an intelligent understanding. I say you have not demonstrated all that; but you have expressed your determination. You are determined to do it, and when you are determined to do it I want to put along with that element, that doubtful element, that ignorant element, that debased element, that element just emerged from slavery, I want you to put along with it into the ballot-box, to neutralize its poison if poison there be, to correct its dangers if danger there be, the female element of the country.

That is my position. If you abandon the whole project I have no objection. I am willing to rest the safety of the country where it is and has been so far. I am open to conviction, open to argument, open to reason even upon that subject; but I am willing to leave this question of suffrage where our fathers left it, where the world leaves it to-day, where all wise men leave it. If, however, it is to be opened, if there is to be a new era, if political power is to be distributed per capita according to a particular age, then I am for extending it to women as well as men. Let me tell the honorable Senator I am not alone in this opinion; the Senator from Ohio with me is not alone; one of the first intellects of this age, perhaps the first man of the first country of the earth, is of the same opinion. I allude to John Stuart Mill, of Great Britain. He is now agitating for this very thing in England. So that it need not seem surprising that I should be in earnest in this; and I trust that after the explanation I have made of my position and my doctrines, I shall not be charged either with insincerity or with a desire to ingratiate myself with the majority of this body, with the majority of the people, or with any one, because thank God I am free from all entanglements of that kind at this present speaking, and if I retain my senses I think I shall keep free.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word upon this subject, because on the first day of the last session of Congress I introduced the original bill now before the Senate, to which the committee have proposed several amendments, and that action on my part I supposed demonstrated sufficiently to all who might read the bill what were my views and sentiments upon the question of suffrage; and, sir, they are of no sudden growth. I have always been of the opinion that in a republican Government the right of voting ought to be limited only by the years of discretion. I have always believed that when a person arrived at the age when by the laws of the country he was remitted to the rights of citizens, when the laws fixed the age of majority when the person was supposed to be competent to manage his own affairs, then he ought to be suffered to participate in the Government under which he lives. Nor do I believe that any such rule is unsafe. I imagine that safety is entirely on the other side, for just in proportion as you limit the franchise, you create in the same degree an aristocracy, an irresponsible Government; and gentlemen must be a little tinctured with a fear of republican sentiment when they fear the extension of the right of suffrage.

If I believed, as some gentlemen do, that to participate in Government required intellect, of the highest character, the greatest perspicacity of mind, the greatest discipline derived from education and experience, I should be convinced that a republican form of government could not live. It is because I believe that all that is essential in government for the welfare of the community is plain, simple, level with the weakest intellects, that I am satisfied this Government ought to stand and will stand forever. Who is it that ought to be protected by these republican Governments? Certainly it is the weak and ignorant, who have no other manner of defending their rights except through the ballot-box.

The argument for aristocracies and monarchies has ever been that the masses of the people do not know enough to take care of the high concerns of Government. If they do not, the human race is in a miserable condition. If, indeed, the great masses of mankind, who are permitted to transact their own business, are incompetent to participate in government, then farewell to the republican system of government; it cannot stand a day; it is a wrong foundation. Our principles of government are radically wrong if gentlemen's fears on this subject are well grounded. Thank God, I know they are not. I know that all the defects and evils of our Government have not come from the ignorant masses; but the frauds and the devices of the higher intellects and the more cultivated minds have brought upon our Government all those scars by which it has been disfigured.

Why, sir, look at the administration of the southern governments in the seceded States, where their public men were advocates of the doctrine that suffrage should be restricted and generally that republican Governments were wrong. I had a great deal of private conversation with the gentlemen who were formerly in these Halls representing those governments, and I hardly ever conversed with a single man of them from that part of the country who believed that a republican Government could or ought to stand. Some of them used to say, "How can the mechanic, how can the laboring man understandingly participate in these high and complicated affairs of Government?" Those men at heart were aristocrats or monarchists; they did not believe in your republican Government. I, on the other hand, believe that the safety of our Government depends on unlimited franchise, or rather, I should say, on franchise limited only by that discretion which fits a man to manage his own concerns. Let a man arrive at the years of majority, when the Government and the experience of the world say that he has attained to such age and such discretion that it is safe to intrust him with his own affairs, and then if he cannot be permitted to participate in the Government, I say again farewell to republican government; it cannot stand.

It was for these reasons that when I introduced the original bill I put it upon the most liberal principle of franchise except as to females. The question of female suffrage had not then been much agitated, and I knew the community had not thought sufficiently upon it to be ready to introduce it as an element in our political system. While I am aware of that fact, I think it will puzzle any gentleman to draw a line of demarkation between the right of the male and the female on this subject. Both are liable to all the laws you pass; their property, their persons, and their lives are affected by the laws. Why, then, should not the females have a right to participate in their construction as well as the male part of the community? There is no argument that I can conceive or that I have yet heard that makes any discrimination between the two on the question of right.

Why should there be any restriction? Is it because gentlemen apprehend that the female portion of the community are not as virtuous, that they are not as well calculated to consider what laws and principles of the government will conduce to their welfare as men are? The great mass of our educated females understand all these great concerns of Government infinitely better than that great mass of ignorant population from other countries which you admit to the polls without hesitation.

But, sir, the right of suffrage in my judgment has bearings altogether beyond any rights of persons or property that are to be vindicated by it. I lay it down that in any free community, if any particular class of that community are excluded from this right they cannot maintain their dignity; it is a brand of Cain upon their foreheads that will sink them into contempt, even in their own estimation. My judgment is that if this right was accorded to females you would find that they would be elevated in their minds and in their intellects. The best discipline you can offer them would be to permit and to require them to participate in these great concerns of Government, so that their rights and the rights of their children should depend in a manner upon the way in which they understand these great things.

What would be the effect upon their minds? Would it not be, I ask you, sir, to lead them from that miserable amusement of reading frivolous books and novels and romances that consume two thirds of their time now, from which they learn nothing, and draw their attention to matters of more moment, more substance, better calculated to well-discipline the mind? In my judgment it would. I believe it would tend to educate them as well as the male part of the population. Take the negroes, who it is said are ignorant, the moment you confer the franchise on them it will lead them to struggle to get an understanding of the affairs of Government so as to be able to participate intelligently in them. They will then understand that they are made responsible for the Government under which they live. In my judgment, this is the reason why the fact exists, which is acknowledged everywhere, that the great mass of our population rise immensely higher in intellect and every quality that should adorn human nature above the peasantry and working classes of the Old World. Why is this? I think much of it results from the fact that the people of this country are compelled to serve upon juries, to participate in the government of their own localities in various capacities, and finally to take part in all the great concerns of Government. That elevates a man and makes him feel his own consequence in the community in which he lives.

It is for these reasons as much as any other that I wish to see the franchise extended to every person of mature age and discretion who has committed no crime. I know very well that prejudices against female voting have descended legitimately to us from the Old World; yea, more than anything else, from that common law which we lawyers have all studied as the first element in jurisprudence. That system of law really sank the female to total contempt and insignificance, almost annihilated her from the face of the earth. It made her responsible for nothing. So far was she removed from participating in anything or being responsible for anything, that if she even committed a crime in the presence of her husband she was not by that old law answerable for it. He was her guardian; he had the right to correct her as the master did his slave in the South. Such was the chivalry of that old common law from which we derive our judicial education. A vast remnant of that old prejudice is still lurking in the minds of our community. It is a mere figment of proscription and nothing else, descended down to us, and we have not overcome it. It is not founded in reason; it is not founded in common sense; and it is being done away with very fast, too.

I know that those women who have taken these things into consideration, with minds as enlightened and as intelligent as our own, have done immense good to their sex by agitating these great subjects against all the ridicule and all the contempt that has been wielded against them from the time they commenced the agitation. I know that in my own State we had a few years ago a great many laws on our statute-book depriving females of a great many rights without the least reason upon earth. Perhaps it was because the question was not agitated and because it did not particularly concern the males that they did not turn their attention to it; but when agitated in the women's rights conventions that have been so abused and ridiculed throughout the country, man could no longer shut his eyes to the glaring defects that existed in our system, and our Legislature has corrected many of those abuses and placed the rights of the female upon infinitely higher grounds than they occupied there thirty years ago; and I believe this remark is as applicable to many other States as it is to Ohio. I tell you the agitation of these subjects has been salutary and good; and our male population would no more go back to divest women of the rights they have acquired than they would go back now to slavery itself in the advance we have lately made.

What do I infer, then, from all this? Seeing that their rights rest upon the same foundation and are only kept down by proscription and prejudice, I think I know that the time will come—not to-day, but the time is approaching—when every female in the country will be made responsible for the just government of our country as much as the male; her right to participate in the Government will be just as unquestioned as that of the male. I know that my opinions on this subject are a little in advance of the great mass, probably, of the community in which I live; but I am advancing a principle. I shall give a vote on this amendment that will be deemed an unpopular vote, but I am not frightened by that. I have been accustomed to give such votes all my life almost, but I believe they have been given in the cause of human liberty and right and in the way of the advancing intelligence of our age; and whenever the landmark has been set up the community have marched up to it. I think I am advocating now the same kind of a principle, and I have no doubt that sooner or later it will become a fixed fact, and the community will think it just as absurd to exclude females from the ballot-box as males.

I do not believe that it will have any unfavorable effect upon the female character if women are permitted to come up to the polls and vote. I believe it would exercise a most humane and civilizing influence upon the roughness and rudeness with which men meet on those occasions if the polished ladies of the land would come up to the ballot-box clothed with these rights and participate in the exercise of the franchise. It has not been found that association with ladies is apt to make men rude and uncivilized; and I do not think the reflex of it presents that ladylike character which we all prize so highly. I do not think it has that effect. On the other hand, in my judgment, if it was popular to-day for ladies to go to the polls, no man would regret their presence there, and the districts where their ballots were given would be harmonized, civilized, and rendered more gentlemanly, if I may so say, on the one side and on the other, and it would prevent the rude collisions that are apt to occur at these places, while it would reflect back no uncivilizing or unladylike influence upon the female part of the community. That is the way I judge it. Of course, as it has never been tried in this country, it is more or less of an experiment; but here in this District is the very place to try your experiment.

I know that the same things were said about the abolition of slavery. I was here. Gentlemen know very well that there was a strong desire entertained by many gentlemen on this floor that emancipation, if it took place, should be very gradual, very conservative, a little at a time. I was the advocate of striking off the shackles at one blow, and I said that the moment you settled on that the community would settle down upon this principle of righteousness, justice, and liberty, and be satisfied with it, but just as long as you kept it in a state of doubt and uncertainty, going only half way, just so long it would be an irritating element in our proceedings. It is just so now with this question. Do not understand that I expect that this amendment will be carried. I do not. I do not know that I would have agitated it now, although it is as clear to me as the sun at noonday that the time is approaching when females will be admitted to this franchise as much as males, because I can see no reason for the distinction. I agree, however, that there is not the same pressing necessity for allowing females as there is for allowing the colored people to vote; because the ladies of the land are not under the ban of a hostile race grinding them to powder. They are in high fellowship with those that do govern, who, to a great extent, act as their agents, their friends, promoting their interests in every vote they give, and therefore communities get along very well without conferring this right upon the female. But when you speak of it as a right and as a great educational power in the hands of females, and I am called on to vote on the subject, I will vote that which I think under all circumstances is right, just, and proper. I shrink not from the question because I am told by gentlemen that it is unpopular. The question with me is, is it right? Show me that it is wrong, and then I will withhold my vote; but I have heard no argument that convinces me that the thing is not right.

There has been something said about this right of voting, as to whether it is a natural or a conventional right. I do not know that there is much difference between a natural and a conventional right. Right has its hold upon the conscience in the inevitable fitness of things, and whether it springs from nature or from any other cause right is right, and a conventional right is as sacred as a natural right. I cannot distinguish them; I know of no difference between them. It certainly does not seem to me that it would be right now if a new community is about to set up a Government, for one third of them to seize upon that Government and say they will govern and the rest shall have nothing to do with it. It seems to me there is a wrong done to those who are shut out from any participation in the Government, and that it is a violation of their rights; and what odds does it make whether you call it a natural or conventional or artificial right? I contend that when you set up a Government you shall call every man who has arrived at the years of discretion, who has committed no crime, into your community and ask him to participate in setting up that Government; and if you shut him out without any reason, you do him a wrong, one of the greatest wrongs that you can inflict upon a man. If it is to be done to me or to my posterity, I say to you take their lives but do not deprive them of the right of standing upon the same foothold, upon the same platform in their political rights with any other man in the community. I will compromise no such principle. I contend before God and man ever, always, that they shall stand upon the same platform in setting up their Governments and in continuing them after they are set up, and I will brand it as a wrong and an injustice in any man to deprive any portion of the population, unless it be for crime or offense, from participating in the Government to the same extent that he participates himself. If they are ignorant, so much the greater necessity that they have this weapon in their hands to guard themselves against the strong. The weaker, the more ignorant, and the more liable they are to be imposed upon, the greater the necessity of having this great weapon of self-defense in their hands.

I know very well that great prejudices have existed against colored people; but my word for it, the moment they are admitted to the ballot-box, especially about the second Tuesday of October in our State, you will find them as genteel a set of men as you know anywhere; as much consideration will be awarded to them; they will be men; they will be courted; their rights will be awarded to them; they will be made to feel, and it will go abroad that they are not the subjects of utter contempt that can be treated as men see fit to treat them; but they will rise in the scale of the community, and finally occupy a platform according to their merits, which they never can obtain, and you will never be able to make anything of any portion of the community, black or white, while you exclude them from the ballot-box.

These, sir, are the reasons why I introduce this bill, and to vindicate them I have spoken.

I know I am not able to set forth anything new on this subject. Every American citizen has reflected upon it until his mind is made up, and the thing itself is so universally approved by our community that the only wonder is that when we propose to extend this franchise to all the people alike anybody is found in opposition to it.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I propose to occupy the time of the Senate for but a few moments by way of explanation of my position on this subject. Honorable Senators seem to think there is some little embarrassment in the position in which we are placed upon this question. There is certainly none whatever to my mind. I must confess, after an examination of this question, that logically there are no reasons in my mind which would not permit women to vote as well as men according to the theory of our Government—a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

But, sir, that question as to whether ladies shall vote or not is not an issue now. That was not the question at the last election. That was not the question that was argued in another part of this Capitol. That was not embraced in the bill now before us for consideration. Questions of a different character engross our attention; and, sir, we have but one straightforward course to pursue in this matter. While I may and do indorse, I believe, substantially all that my honorable friend from Ohio has said, and while I cannot state perhaps a good reason why under our form of government all persons, male and female, should not exercise the right of suffrage, yet we have another matter on hand now. We have fought the fight and our banners blaze victoriously in the sky. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania stands humbled and overcome at his defeat, and he might just as well bow his head before the wheels of that Juggernaut of which he spoke, which has crushed him to the earth, and say, let the vox populi, which is the vox Dei, be the rule of this land.

I believe that this issue will come, and if the gentleman proposes to make it in the next elections I shall be with him perhaps on the question of universal suffrage; for, sir, I am for universal suffrage. I am not for qualified suffrage; I am not for property suffrage; I am not for intelligent suffrage as it is termed; but I am for universal suffrage. That is my doctrine. But, sir, when it is proposed to crush out the will of the American people by an issue which certainly is not made in sincerity and truth, then I have no difficulty whatever. While I do not commit myself against the progress of human civilization, because I believe that time is coming, in voting "no" on this amendment I only vote to maintain the position for which I have fought and for which my State has fought.

My notions are peculiar on this subject. I confess that I am for universal suffrage, and when the time comes I am for suffrage by females as well as males; but that is not the point before us. This bill has passed the other House. The country expects the verdict of the people to be sustained by this body, and we must do it. Upon the question of reconstruction there are other points; questions of universal amnesty, questions of universal suffrage. The verdict of the people has been against universal amnesty as well as for universal suffrage. It has been raised for universal suffering for rebels who raised their arms against this Government, and universal suffrage and every right to the men who have stood by the Government and fought with us through this war. Sir, I shall most cheerfully and with perfect consistency vote "no" against this amendment, viewing it as a mere attempt on the part of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania to embarrass this question.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania demands that I shall express my concurrence in or my opposition to his amendment. I tell him without the least hesitation I shall vote against it. I am opposed to connecting together these two questions, the enfranchisement ment of black men and the enfranchisement of women, and therefore shall vote against his amendment.

These ladies in the conventions recently held seem to have made a great impression upon the Senator from Pennsylvania. While I heard him reading their speeches I could not but regret that the Senator had not read the speeches of some of those ladies and the speeches of some of those gentlemen who attended those recent meetings before he came into the Senate. If he had read the speeches of the ladies and gentlemen who have attended these conventions during the past few years their speeches might have made as great an impression on him at an earlier day as they seem to have done at this; and if they had done so, the Senator might have made a record for liberty, justice, and humanity he would have been proud of after he leaves the Senate.

I have, sir, quite the advantage of the honorable Senator. I have been accustomed to attend the meetings of some of these ladies and gentlemen for many years, and read their speeches, too. I read these speeches for the freedom of all, and for the enfranchisement of all, woman included. Before I came to the Senate of the United States I entertained the conviction that it would be better for this country, that our legislation would be more humane, more for liberty, more for a high civilization, if the women of the country were permitted to vote, and every year of my life has confirmed that conviction. I have been more than ever convinced of it since I have read the opinions of one of the foremost men of this or any other age, John Stuart Mill.

But I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that while these are my opinions, while I will vote now or at any time for woman suffrage, if he or any other Senator will offer it as a distinct, separate measure, I am unalterably opposed to connecting that question with the pending question of negro suffrage. The question of negro suffrage is now an imperative necessity; a necessity that the negro should possess it for his own protection; a necessity that he should possess it that the nation may preserve its power, its strength, and its unity. We have fought that battle, as has been stated by the Senator from Illinois; we have won negro suffrage for the District of Columbia, and I say I believe we have won it for all the States; and before the 4th of March, 1869, before this Administration shall close, I hope that the negro in all the loyal States will be clothed with the right of suffrage. That they will be in the ten rebel States I cannot doubt, for patriotism, liberty, justice, and humanity demand it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire the Senator to allow me to ask him a question, as he says that this has been won in the recent elections. I wish to know of the Senator why the consideration of this measure was discontinued at the last session and the bill not allowed to pass the Senate? The bill came from the House at rather an early day of the session; I think several months of the session elapsed after the passage of the bill in the House, and yet it was not allowed to come to a vote in the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. The bill passed the House of Representatives early in the session. It came to the Senate early in December. That Senator I think knows very well that we had not the power to pass it for the first five or six months of the session; that is, we had not the power to make it a law. We could not have carried it against the opposition of the President of the United States, and we had assurances of gentlemen who were in intimate relations with him that his signature would not be obtained. It would not have been wise for us to pass the bill if it was to encounter a veto unless we were able to pass it over that veto. The wise course was to bide our time until we had that power, and that power came before the close of the session, but it came in the time of great pressure, when other questions were crowding upon us, and it was thought best by those who were advocating it, especially as the chairmen of the committee, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] was out of the Senate for many days on account of illness; to let the bill go over until this December.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask one other question: whether the vetoes of the President were not over-ridden in the Senate as much as two months before the adjournment; and whether he does not know that this measure was purposely put aside in the Senate that it should not enter into the political contest of the last elections?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that it was purposely postponed for that reason. I do know, however, that there were Senators who were in doubt in regard to the form the measure should take. Some Senators wished for a measure based on intelligence, and it was a little uncertain whether at that time we could command a two-thirds vote for pure manhood suffrage. The measure went over by the assent of many of its most earnest friends, in the full conviction that the voice of the country, the growth of public sentiment—which was great every day then, and has increased every day since and will grow stronger in the days to come—would enable us to carry a clean bill for the District early in this session. We were not mistaken in our anticipations. This bill, embodying pure manhood suffrage, is destined to become the law in spite of all opposition and all lamentations. I am opposed, therefore, to associating with this achieved measure the question of suffrage for women. That question has been discussed for many years by ladies of high intelligence and of stainless character—ladies who have given years of their lives to the cause of liberty, to the cause of the bondman, to the cause of justice and humanity, to the improvement of all and the elevation of all. No one could have heard them or have read their speeches years ago without feeling that they were in earnest. They have made progress; these women have instructed the country; women and men, too, have been instructed; progress is making in that direction; but the public judgment is not so pronounced in any one State to-day in favor of woman suffrage as to create any large and general movement for it.

Time is required to instruct the public mind and to carry forward and to concentrate the public judgment in favor of woman suffrage. All public men are not in its favor as is the Senator from Ohio, as has already been proved in this debate. I am therefore, sir, for keeping these questions apart. I am for securing the needed suffrage for the colored race. I am for enfranchising the black man, and then if this other question shall come up in due time and I have a vote to give I shall be ready to give my vote for it. But to vote for it now is to couple it with the great measure now pressing upon us, to weaken that measure and to endanger its immediate triumph, and therefore I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, made, it is too apparent, not for the enfranchisement of woman, but against the enfranchisement of the black man.

Mr. JOHNSON. The immediate question before the Senate, I understand, is upon the amendment offered by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, which, if I am correctly informed, is to strike out the word "male," so as to give to all persons, independent of sex, the right of voting. It is, therefore, a proposition to admit to the right of suffrage all the females in the District of Columbia who may have the required residence and are of the required age. I am not aware that the right is given to that class anywhere in the United States. I believe for a very short time—my friend from New Jersey will inform me if I am correct—it was more or less extended to the women in New Jersey; but, if that be an exception, it is, as far as I am informed, the only exception; and there are a variety of reasons why, as I suppose, the right has never been extended as now proposed.

Ladies have duties peculiar to themselves which cannot be discharged by anybody else; the nurture and education of their children; the demands upon them consequent upon the preservation of their household; and they are supposed to be more or less in their proper vocation when they are attending to those particular duties. But independent of that, I think if it was submitted to the ladies—I mean the ladies in the true acceptance of the term—of the United States, the privilege would not only not be asked for, but would be rejected. I do not think the ladies of the United States would agree to enter into a canvass and to undergo what is often the degradation of seeking to vote, particularly in the cities, getting up to the polls, crowded out and crowded in. I rather think they would feel it, instead of a privilege, a dishonor.

There is another reason why the right should not be extended to them, unless it is the purpose of the honorable member and of the Senate to go a step further. The reason why the males are accorded the privilege, and why it was almost universal in the United States with reference to those of a certain age, is that they may be called upon to defend the country in time of war or in time of insurrection. I do not suppose it is pretended that the ladies should be included in the militia organization or be compelled to take up arms to defend the country. That must be done by the male sex, I hope.

But I rose not so much for the purpose of expressing my own opinion, or reasoning rather upon the opinion, as to refer to a sentence or two in a letter written many years ago by the elder Adams to a correspondent in Massachusetts. It was proposed at that time in Massachusetts to alter the suffrage. It was then limited in that State. That limitation, it was suggested, should be taken away in whole or in part, and the correspondent to whom this letter was addressed seems to have been in favor of that change. Mr. Adams, under date of the 26th of May, 1776, writes to his correspondent, Mr. James Sullivan, a name famous in the annals of Massachusetts, and well known to the United States, a long letter, of which I shall read only a sentence or two. It is to be found in the ninth volume of the Works of John Adams, beginning at page 375. In that letter, Mr. Adams, among other things, says:

"But let us first suppose that the whole community, of every age, rank, sex, and condition, has a right to vote. This community is assembled. A motion is made and carried by a majority of one voice. The minority will not agree to this. Whence arises the right of the majority to govern and the obligation of the minority to obey?"

"From necessity, you will say, because there can be no other rule."

"But why exclude women?"

"You will say, because their delicacy renders them unfit for practice and experience in the great businesses of life and the hardy enterprises of war, as well as the arduous cares of state. Besides, their attention is so much engaged with the necessary nurture of their children that nature has made them fittest for domestic cares. And children have not judgment or will of their own. True?"

And he closes the letter by saying:

"Society can be governed only by general rules. Government cannot accommodate itself to every particular case as it happens, nor to the circumstances of particular persons. It must establish general comprehensive regulations for masses and persons. The only question is, which general rule will accommodate most cases and most persons."

"Depend upon it, sir, it is dangerous to open so fruitful a source of controversy and altercation as would be opened by attempting to alter the qualifications of voters; there will be no end of it. New claims will arise; women will demand a vote; lads from twelve to twenty-one will think their rights not enough attended to; and every man who has not a farthing will demand an equal voice with any other in all acts of state. It tends to confound and destroy all distinctions, and prostrate all ranks to one common level."

The honorable member from Ohio seems to suppose that the right should be given as a means, if I understood him, of protecting themselves and as a means of elevating them intellectually. I had supposed the theory was that the woman was protected by the man. If she is insulted she is not expected to knock the man who insults her down, or during the days of the duello to send him a challenge. She goes to her male friend, her husband or brother or acquaintance. Nature has not made her for the rough and tumble, so to speak, of life. She is intended to be delicate. She is intended to soften the asperities and roughness of the male sex. She is intended to comfort him in the days of his trial, not to participate herself actively in the contest either in the forum, in the council chamber, or on the battle-field. As to her not being protected, what lady has ever said that her rights were not protected because she had not the right of suffrage? There are women, respectable I have no doubt in point of character, moral and virtuous women no doubt, but they are called, and properly called, the "strong-minded;" they are in the public estimation contradistinguished from the delicate; they are men in women's garb, ready, I have no doubt, such people would be—and I deem it no disparagement to them; I have no doubt they are conscientious—to go upon the battle-field. Such things have happened. They are willing to take an insult and horse-whip and chastise the man who has extended the rudeness to them; but they are exceptions to the softness which is the charm of the female character. I appeal to my friend from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,]—I can speak for Baltimore—and to the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] who I suppose can speak for Philadelphia, would they have their wives and their daughters seeking to get up to the poll on a hotly-contested election, driven with indignation at times from it, insulted, violence used to them, as is often the case, rudeness of speech sure to be indulged in—

Mr. WADE. I should like to know if that is the character of your city.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. WADE. Then it is very different from the community in which I live.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rather think you might make Cincinnati an exception, from what I have heard. I am not speaking of the country, though I have seen it pretty rough in the country, and they have been rough occasionally in Ohio. If they were all of the same temper with my honorable friend who interrupts me of course it would be different, and all could have their rights accorded them.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask whether the presence of ladies on an occasion of that kind would not tend to suppress everything of that sort. Would it not turn the blackguard into a gentleman, so that we should have nothing but good conduct?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; you cannot turn a blackguard into a gentleman.

Mr. COWAN. Except by a lady.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; by no means known to human power. There may be some revulsion that will cause him to cease to be a blackguard for the moment, but as to a lady making a gentleman of a man who insults her it has not happened that I know of anywhere. He may be made somewhat of a gentleman by being cowed. But the question I put I put in all seriousness. I have seen the elections in Baltimore, where they are just as orderly as they are in other cities; but we all know that in times of high party excitement it is impossible to preserve that order which would be sufficient to protect a delicate female from insult, and no lady would venture to run the hazard of being subjected to the insults that she would be almost certain to receive.

They do not want this privilege. As to protecting themselves, as to taking a part in the Government in order to protect themselves, if they govern those who govern, is not that protection enough? And who does not know that they govern us? Thank God they do. But what more right has a woman, as a mere matter of right independent of all delicacy, to the suffrage than a boy who is just one day short of twenty-one? You put him in your military service when he is eighteen; you may put him in it at a younger age if you think proper; but you will not let him vote. Why? Only upon moral grounds; that is all; not because that boy may not be able to exercise the right, but because, in the language of Mr. Adams, there must be some general rule which must be observed; because in the absence of such general rule, if you permit excepted cases you might as well abolish all rules, and then where are we, as he properly asks.

I like to learn wisdom from the men of 1776. I know we have had the advantage of living in an age which they did not witness. I have lived a good many years and watched the public men of the day, and I do not think, and I have never been able with all my disposition to think that we are any better than were the men of 1776 and our predecessors on this floor, the men who participated in the deliberations of the Convention which led to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the men who were the authors of the State Papers which filled the world with admiration and amazement, which were issued during that period. We know more of some things; we have more physical science than they had; the inventive genius of the country and of the age is greater than it was in the times in which they lived; but in all the knowledge that history can give, in all the knowledge that ethics can give, in all the knowledge that political economy can give, they were at least our equals; and no man, I am sure, (for I share but in the pleasure which each of us has received,) can read the letters and the papers that came from the pens of the men of that day without feeling a wish, without praying, if he is ambitious, that he was equal to them. But that is apart from the subject.

From the days of colonization down to the present hour no such proposition as this has received, so far as I am aware, any support, unless it was for a short time in the State of New Jersey. It has nothing to do with the right of negroes to vote. That is perfectly independent. If I desired because I am opposed to that to defeat the bill, I might perhaps, as a mere party scheme, as a measure known to party tactics which govern occasionally some—I do not say that they have not governed me heretofore—vote for this amendment with a view to defeat the bill; but I have lived to be too old and have become too well satisfied of what I think is my duty to the country to give any vote which I do not believe, if it should be supported by the votes of a sufficient number to carry the measure into operation, would redound to the interests and safety and honor of the country.

Mr. WADE. The gentleman seems to suppose that the only reason females should have the right to vote is that they might defend themselves with a cowhide against those who insult them. I do not suppose that giving them the right to vote will add anything to their physical strength or courage. That is the argument of the Senator, and the whole of his argument; but I did not propose that they should vote on such hypothesis or with any view that it should have any such effect. But I do know that as the law stood until very recently in many of the States a husband was not the best guardian for his wife in many cases, and frequently the greatest hardships that I have ever known in the community have arisen from the fact that a good-for-nothing, drunken, miserable man had married a respectable lady with property, and your law turned the whole of it right over to him and left her a pauper at his will. While I was at the bar I was more conversant with the manner in which these domestic affairs were transacted than I am now; and I knew instances of the greatest hardship arising from the fact that the law permitted such things to be done. I have known a drunken, miserable wretch of a husband take possession of a large property of a virtuous, excellent woman, who had a family of small children depending upon her, and turn her out to support her family by sewing and by manual labor; and it is not an uncommon case. The legislators, the males having the law-making power in their hands, especially were not very prompt to correct these evils; they were very slow in doing so. They continued from the old common law, when the memory of man did not run to the contrary, down to a time that is within the recollection of us all; and I do not know but that in some of the States this absurd rule prevails even now. It would not have prevailed if ladies had been permitted to vote for their legislators. They would have instructed them, and would have withheld their votes from every one who would not correct these most glaring evils.

The Senator tells us that the community in which he lives is so barbarous and rude that a lady could not go to the polls to perform a duty which the law permitted without insult and rudeness. That is a state of things that I did not believe existed anywhere. I do not believe that it exists in Baltimore to-day. I do not believe if the ladies of Baltimore should go up to the polls clothed with the legal right to select their own legislators that there is anybody in Baltimore who would insult them on their way in performing that duty. I do not believe that our communities have got to that degree of depravity yet that such kind of rascally prudence is necessary to be exercised in making laws. On the other hand, I have always found wherever I have gone that the rude and the rough in their conduct were civilized and ameliorated by the presence of females; for I do believe, as much as I believe anything else, that, take the world as it is, the female part of it are really more virtuous than the males. I think so; and I think if we were to permit them to have this right it would tend to a universal reform instead of the reverse; and I do not believe any lady would be insulted in any community that I know anything about while on her way to perform this duty.

As I can see no good reason to the contrary, I shall vote for this proposition. I shall vote as I have often voted, as the Senator from Massachusetts has often voted, what he believed to be right; not because he believed a majority were with him, but because he believed the proposition which he was called upon to vote for was right, just, and proper. It is because I cannot see that this is not so that I vote for it. It comes from a Senator who does not generally vote with us; it is a proposition unlooked for from his general course of action in this body, being, as he says, on the conservative list, and generally for holding things just as they are. Well, sir, I am for holding them just as they are when I think they are right, and when I think they are not I am for changing them and making them right. I do not think it is right to exclude females from the right of suffrage. As I said before, I do not expect that public opinion will be so correct at this time that my vote will be effective; but nevertheless it would be no excuse for me that I did not do my part toward effecting a reform that I think the community requires, because I did not see that the whole world was going with me. I do not wait for that. I am frequently in minorities. I would as lief be there as anywhere else, provided I see that I am right; and I do not wait for the majority to go with me when I think a proposition is right. Therefore I shall vote for this amendment if nobody else votes for it, trusting that if I am right the world will finally see it and come up to the mark where I am; if I am wrong, on further investigation and further thought I shall be left in the lurch. Believing that I am right, and believing that the world will come up to this standard finally, I am ambitious to make my mark upon it right here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has made an inquiry as to the law of New Jersey in reference to women voting. There was a period in New Jersey when, in reference to some local matters, and those only, women voted; but that period has long since passed away; and I think I am authorized in saying that the women of New Jersey to-day do not desire to vote.

Sir, I confess a little surprise at the remark which has been so frequently made in the Senate, that there is no difference between granting suffrage to colored citizens and extending it to the women of America. The difference, to my mind, is as wide as the earth. As I understand it, we legislate for classes, and the women of America as a class do vote now, though there are exceptions from the peculiar circumstances of individuals. Do not the American people vote in this Senate to-day on this question? Do they not vote in the House of Representatives? So the women of America vote by faithful and true representatives, their husbands, their brothers, their sons; and no true man will go to the polls and deposit his ballot without remembering the true and loving constituency that he has at home.

More than that, sir, ninety-nine out of a hundred, I believe nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand, of the women in America do not want the privilege of voting in any other manner than that which I have stated. In both these regards there is a vast difference between the situation of the colored citizen and the women of America.

But, Mr. President, besides that, the women of America are not called upon to serve the Government as the men of America are. They do not bear the bayonet, and have not that reason why they should be entitled to the ballot; and it seems to me as if the God of our race has stamped upon them a milder, gentler nature, which not only makes them shrink from, but disqualifies them for the turmoil and battle of public life. They have a higher and a holier mission. It is in retracy, to make the character of coming men. Their mission is at home, by their blandishments and their love to assuage the passions of men as they come in from the battle of life, and not themselves by joining in the contest to add fuel to the very flames.

The learned and eloquent Senator from Pennsylvania said yesterday with great beauty that he wanted to cast the angel element into the suffrage system of America. Sir, it seems to me that it would be ruthlessly tearing the angel element from the homes of America; and the homes of the people of America are infinitely more valuable than any suffrage system. It will be a sorry day for this country when those vestal fires of piety and love are put out.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Christian religion, which has elevated woman to her true position as a peer by the side of man, from which she was taken; that religion which is a part of the common law of this land, in its very spirit and declarations recognizes man as the representative of woman. The very structure of that religion which for centuries has been being built recognizes that principle, and it is written on its very door-posts. The woman, it is true, was first tempted; but it was in Adam that we all died. The angel, it is true, appeared to Mary; but it is in the God-man that we are all made alive.

I do not see that there is any parity of reasoning between the case of the women of America, entitling them or making it desirable that they should have suffrage, and that of the colored citizen of the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. It does not appear that we can come to a vote to-night upon this proposition, and I therefore rise to propose an adjournment.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps we can get a vote on this simple amendment.

Mr. BROWN and others. Oh, no; let us adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I doubt whether there is any inclination to talk further on this amendment, and I should be glad to get a vote on it before we adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senate will come to a vote, I will not move an adjournment.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Missouri will give way, I will renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I do not care particularly to detain the Senate. I have but a very few remarks to make.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will give way I will renew the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri as yielding the floor?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 11, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Another member appeared, namely, Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada.

REPUBLICANS OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. KELLEY. I present the memorial and resolutions of the central executive committee of the Republican party of Louisiana, and move that it be referred to the committee on reconstruction, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF COIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to regulate the sale of coin and bullion by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to this bill, or any other of the same character. Their tendency is to put the matter of our currency and finances in the hands of the gold gamblers of Wall street. I hope the bill will not be received.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In reply to the remark of my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN,] I have to say that the object of this bill is to take the matter out of the hands of the gold gamblers and to put a stop to gold gambling, whereby the sudden fluctuations in the price of gold will be stopped; and this bill proposes to put it out of the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to wield a golden scepter more powerful than that of any monarch in the world, a scepter of $95,000,000 in gold. This bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall give public notice whenever the amount of gold in the Treasury shall exceed $50,000,000, and that he shall—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a point of order, and that is that this debate is all out of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I only desire to reply to the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to the reception of the bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well; if the gentleman is on the side of speculators, I cannot help it. I give notice that I will at some future time introduce this bill.

REPRESENTATION OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the credentials of Alexander H. Jones, claiming to be elected a member from the seventh congressional district of North Carolina; which, under the order of the House of last session, were referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

COMMITTEE VACANCY FILLED.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, to fill a vacancy upon the select committee to investigate the New Orleans riots.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill with the following title, namely: an act (S. No. 327) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharine F. Winslow; when the Speaker signed the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee of Claims, where the call rested on Thursday last.

COMMITTEE OF CLAIMS.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims have power to send for persons and papers when in their opinion it may be necessary to do so in the investigation of claims before said committee.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives elected, and place thereon the names of all persons claiming seats as Representatives elected from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress whose credentials shall show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States.

The second section provides that in case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk of the House of Representatives, or of absence or inability of said Clerk to discharge the duties imposed on him by law or custom relative to the preparation of a roll of Representatives for the organization of the House of Representatives, the said duties shall devolve on the Sergeant-at-Arms of the next preceding House of Representatives; and in case of vacancies in both the before mentioned officers, or the absence or inability of both the Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms to act, then the said duties shall be performed by the Doorkeeper of the next preceding House of Representatives.

The third section provides that a violation of the provisions of this act by any officer mentioned therein shall be deemed a felony, and upon conviction thereof the officer shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term not less than one or more than five years, in the discretion of the court.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state that the only change in the existing law made by the first section of this bill is to direct the Clerk of the House of Representatives in making up the roll of Representatives, to put on it the name of no person from a State not represented in the next preceding Congress. In other respects the section follows the existing law.

The second section provides for a succession of officers to discharge the duties prescribed by the first section. Under existing law, in case of the absence of the Clerk, or his inability to act, there is no provision for the duties being performed by any other person. This second section provides that in that case the duties shall devolve upon the Sergeant-at-Arms of the next preceding House of Representatives, and in the case of a vacancy also in the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, or of his inability to act, then the duties shall be performed by the Doorkeeper of the next preceding House.

The last section of the bill contains merely a provision for the enforcement of the preceding provisions of the bill; providing for punishment by imprisonment of any breach of the provisions of the act in respect to the duties prescribed.

I will now call the previous question on the passage of the bill, unless some member desires some further explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to suggest a point which occurs to me. Suppose, for instance, that on the last day of this session the two Houses of Congress should declare Arkansas entitled to representation, but that at that time no person should appear to represent that State. Now, if I have understood correctly the language of the bill as presented by the gentleman from Iowa, at the opening of the next Congress Representatives-elect from that State could not take any part in the organization of the House; for this bill declares that the names of no persons shall be placed on the roll except those coming from States that were represented in the next preceding Congress. It seems to me that the language of the bill should be so modified as to provide for placing on the roll the names of Representatives, not only from States represented in the preceding Congress, but also from States that had been declared entitled to representation. It occurs to me that this point ought to be covered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would suggest to the gentleman that the remedy for the difficulty he suggests would be that a resolution declaring Arkansas entitled to representation should provide for placing upon the roll of the next House the names of the persons claiming to be members from that State. It would be just as easy to include that in such a resolution as to provide for all these cases in this bill; and I think it would be the easier method of disposing of this matter. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to inquire whether this bill has been printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It has not.

Mr. FINCK. It certainly is a measure of much importance, and ought to be printed and deliberately considered. I hope that the gentleman will agree that the bill shall be printed and its consideration fixed for some day certain.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman heard the explanation which I made of the bill I think he can have no difficulty in understanding it. The only material change made in the existing law is, as I have stated, that in the first section of the bill it is declared that the Clerk, in making up his roll of Representatives, shall not put upon it the name of any person from a State not represented in the next preceding Congress.

Mr. FINCK. That is just what I object to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. FINCK. I shall call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, there being—ayes 86, noes 28.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 31, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos H. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Leftwich, Loan, McCullough, Myers, Newell, Noel, Phelps, Radford, Strouse, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—36.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, said: I desire to announce that the gentleman from New York, Mr. WINFIELD, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In explanation of the absence of my colleague, Mr. WARNER, on this and other votes to-day, I desire to state that he is detained at his home by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with a recommendation that it pass, a bill to prevent the reception and counting of illegal electoral votes in the election of President and Vice President of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and reported at length.

The Clerk then read the bill in extenso.

Mr. FINCK. I want to make the same inquiry in regard to this I did in regard to the other bill; whether it has been printed?

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. This bill has not been printed.

Mr. FINCK. It is a matter of great importance, and ought not to be pressed without some discussion and some examination. I hope the gentleman will agree to have the bill printed and postponed to a day certain.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I will briefly explain this bill, and then, if it be the desire of the House to have it postponed, I will interpose no objection.

I will state that in the preparation of the bill and preamble the committee was careful not to go beyond the precedents already established. In the recital of the preamble we have adopted the declaration of the President of the United States, that the revolutionary progress made by the people of the South deprived certain portions of the Union of civil governments. We accept that declaration of the President.

We have also followed the declaration made by Congress in the joint resolution providing for the admission of members from the State of Tennessee, that the political relation of portions of the Union represented formerly as the States named in Congress can only be restored by consent of the law-making power of the United States. Upon those two declarations we base the justification of the section of the bill. In the preparation of the bill we have followed the precedent established by the Thirty-Eighth Congress when the following joint resolution was passed:

Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College.

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such condition on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for President and Vice President of the United States, according to the Constitution and laws thereof, was held therein on said day: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for said term of office. Approved February 8, 1865.

So the only difference between this precedent established by the Thirty-Eighth Congress and the section of the bill now reported is, that the joint resolution of the Thirty-Eighth Congress was confined in its operations to the presidential elections of 1864, while this bill provides that it shall apply indefinitely.

Mr. FINCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINCK. Is there not another difference, that we were at that time in the midst of war, while we are now in the midst of peace?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We were at that time in the midst of war; but we think, sir, that the effects of that war upon those communities exist to-day; holding as we do with the President that that war against the Government of the United States deprived those people of all civil governments, and being deprived of all civil governments they cannot be permitted to participate in an election of President and Vice President of the United States until they shall have been provided with civil governments; and Congress in the Tennessee case declared that could only be done, that the relation thus disturbed could only be restored by the consent of the law-making power of the United States.

No such consent has been given to the people of those portions of the United States set out in the preamble of this bill and in the body of the bill itself. Consequently the conclusion we draw must be correct, that, being deprived of civil governments, having their political relations so disturbed as that they are not entitled to appear in the Congress of the United States in the persons of Senators and Representatives, and that their former condition can only be acquired again by the consent of the law-making power, I say our conclusion is correct that no electoral votes should be received from communities of that character. That, sir, is the whole case presented by this bill. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, without expressing any opinion upon the merits of this bill, I beg leave to appeal to this House not to force action upon it this morning without its being printed, without an opportunity for its examination by members, and without an opportunity for discussion. It is certainly as grave a question as has ever engaged the attention even of this Congress, whose time has been occupied with grave questions from its commencement; and it does strike me that the case is not so clear in regard to precedent as has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in his argument. It does not necessarily follow—and gentlemen will not understand me as attempting to controvert the truth of the gentleman's position, but merely to state that I am not satisfied with his argument as it stands now—it does not necessarily follow that what was within the sphere of Congress at a time when rebellion was actually raging, is a necessary precedent for action to-day, when, whatever may be the theory in regard to the status of the States lately in rebellion, it cannot be claimed that we are in a state of bello flagrante.

Now, while for myself I do conceive that it is in the power of Congress to determine to a certain extent when, how, and how far States shall be restored to their representation in Congress and in the Electoral College, I also believe with equal sincerity that there is a limit to that power by this body, and that it does not lie with this Congress under all circumstances and in all cases, in time of peace as well as in time of war, to say that certain States or communities shall not be represented upon this floor.

I therefore urge the gentleman who reports this bill, and I urge the majority of this House, not to force action this morning under the operation of the previous question, but to allow the bill to be printed and its consideration set down for an early day, so as to give us all a reasonable opportunity for examination and discussion. If that is done I will not say that I shall be found in opposition to the bill. I may be found supporting it. But I am to-day unprepared—and I say it with all sincerity and honesty—to record my vote upon so important a measure as this. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a motion to print the bill and make it the special order for an early day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. What day?

Mr. HALE. Say to-morrow week.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am not disposed to press this bill on an unwilling body, and if it can be set down as the special order for to-morrow, and in the mean time printed, I have no objection to that order being made. I stated at the commencement of my remarks that if the House desired it I would not object to a postponement. I will move, therefore, that it be postponed and printed and made the special order for Thursday next, after the morning hour.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman if he contemplates any debate upon this bill when it comes up on that day, or whether he intends to call the previous question, as he did on this day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman shall have an opportunity to discuss it if he desires it. I shall be governed somewhat by the circumstances. I do not intend to press the bill unreasonably.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not inquire on account of myself alone, but there are gentlemen around me who wish to know whether general discussion is to be allowed on the bill or not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I certainly will allow reasonable discussion upon the bill.

The motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly postponed, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Thursday next after the morning hour.

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 858, to repeal the neutrality laws, and moved that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF TREASON.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 624, to repeal certain parts of the act approved April 30, 1790, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill repeals so much of section thirty-two of an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, approved April 30, 1790, as provides that no person or persons shall be prosecuted, tried, and punished for treason or other capital offense unless indictment for the same shall be found by a grand jury within three years next after the treason or capital offense shall be done or committed; and provides that all persons who have been or may be guilty of treason or other capital offense may at any time be indicted, tried, and punished therefor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will explain this bill briefly to the House, and I think there will be no objection to its passage.

The act of April 30, 1790, providing for the punishment of treason, limits prosecutions to three years. If that act, or its limitation, shall remain in force, it will in a very short time be equivalent to a general pardon or amnesty for every act of treason during the late rebellion. This bill proposes to repeal so much of that act as limits prosecutions to three years; and it provides that all persons who have been or may be guilty of treason or other capital offense may at any time be indicted, tried, and punished therefor.

Mr. HALE. Does the bill affect any other crime than treason?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Treason or other capital offenses. There is in the States as a general rule no limitation at all upon the prosecution of capital offenses. There ought not to be in relation to the crime of treason; and the only questions, I suppose, which will arise on the passage of this bill will be as to the expediency of passing it, and our power to pass it.

As to the expediency, I have only to say I suppose this House have determined for themselves that they are not in favor of a general amnesty or pardon of all those who were guilty of treason during the rebellion. On the first day of this session we passed a bill to repeal so much of existing laws as authorize the President to grant general amnesty or pardon, yet the limitation contained in the law of 1790, if it shall continue in force, will very soon be equivalent to general amnesty and pardon.

As to the other branch of the question, our right to pass this bill, I have this to say: the right of a nation to prosecute for a violation of its laws is analogous to the right of a citizen to sue for a wrong to his person or property, or for the violation of a contract. In all these cases the courts administering the law distinguish between the right and the remedy.

The "right" growing out of the "obligation" of a contract cannot be divested, for it is protected by the Constitution. The right of redress for a wrong to the person or property is equally a vested right which cannot be impaired. But the remedy is a very different affair. The Legislature may not only prescribe a limitation for future contracts and rights of action, but in the language of the Note to section twenty-two of Angel on Limitations—

"A statute of limitations may well apply to contracts in existence at the time of its passage, provided a reasonable time be allowed before the statute takes effect, or the debt barred, within which creditors may institute their actions."

And again the same note says:

"But a statute extending the time of limitation will not revive causes of action already barred under preexisting statutes." "If, however, the cause of action be not already barred, the statute extending the time will apply."

These principles apply as well to criminal prosecutions as to civil actions, for in either case the law which regulates the time of prosecuting or suing affects only the remedy and not the right, whether the time for prosecuting or suing is enlarged or abridged.

This bill is not objectionable upon the ground that it will be ex post facto. An ex post facto law is—"One which renders an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed."—6 Cranch, 138.

If an act is not punishable when committed, it cannot by subsequent law be made so. The test of an ex post facto law is the criminality or innocence of an act at the time of its commission. The mode of prosecution, the time when or within which it shall be prosecuted, or the tribunals which shall try it are all subject to regulation by law.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to inquire of my colleague whether the committee looked into the question of our power to revive the right of prosecution for treason where the act of 1790 has already barred prosecution, and whether this bill undertakes to do that? I may say that I trust the law may be in that way. I would be very glad to have it so.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The committee did examine that question. The authority to which I have referred in the Note to Angel on Limitations I suppose settles that question.

Where a crime is already barred no act, I suppose, can revive the right of prosecution.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Your bill then does not do that?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir; the bill cannot effect an impossibility.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. My inquiry was whether the bill undertakes to revive the right of prosecution where the limitation is already completed?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The clause in the bill to which my colleague desires to call attention I suppose is this: "And all persons who have been or may be guilty of treason or other capital offense may at any time be indicted, tried, and punished therefor." That clause is, of course, only to be applicable to those cases where by law it is possible to prosecute. The general design of the bill is simply to repeal that limitation of three years, so that the general pardon and amnesty which it will soon effect may be avoided.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to inquire of my colleague if he designs to impose any limitation whatever?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. Would it not be better to extend the time?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir; I think not. There is no limitation in murder cases in Ohio, a State whose jurisprudence has been illustrated by my distinguished colleague as a member of its supreme court, and I think it is not usual in the States to affix any limitation. But if a limitation shall be desirable hereafter it will be competent for Congress to prescribe a limitation. It is certainly not desirable now, and we cannot tell now, under this Administration, when it may be desirable to affix a limitation.

Mr. CONKLING. Gentlemen seem to agree that if a crime or offense is outlawed or barred it cannot be revived by subsequent enactment. Now, I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether his whole purpose would not be accomplished by repealing the statute of limitation as it stands, and whether it is worth while, not only to repeal the statute, but to put in the bill an attempt to do what we know we cannot constitutionally do, namely, revive an offense which is in truth outlawed. I understand this bill in the commencement to repeal and brush away that statute by virtue of which alone this crime is outlawed, and it then proceeds to enact that all persons who have heretofore at any time (that is the legal construction of the language) committed treason shall be punishable hereafter.

And yet we know that if in truth the statute has run the offense is dead, and any law which seeks to revive it is an ex post facto law. Now, I submit to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] that we will accomplish his whole purpose by a simple repeal of the statute of which he desires to get rid.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I think it better to leave the question to the courts to determine how much of this bill may be operative. If this bill shall not pass then all the early treason of Jeff. Davis and those who cooperated with him will be entirely exempt from punishment. I am willing to go to the very verge of the Constitution for the purpose of reaching the early treasonable acts which inaugurated the late rebellion. I do not know what the courts will hold upon this question, and for that reason the bill has been introduced in this shape.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I approach with great distrust all bills of this kind, which are evidently brought forward for the purpose of ascertaining how we can convict men whom we cannot convict under laws existing when the crimes were committed. I do not believe that it becomes this nation, I do not believe it is safe for us to undertake to pass laws by which we can or may be able to punish men however guilty who could not be punished under the law existing when the crimes were committed.

Could we now change our Constitution so as to change the place of trial of traitors, to say that the venue might be changed, and that they should be tried by jurors summoned from another bailiwick? The Constitution and our laws provide very carefully that, especially in the case of treason, the party charged with that crime must be tried at the place where the overt act was committed, in a district previously ascertained by law, and by a jury from that bailiwick. Now, any law which professes to change that in any respect looks to me so much like an attempt to commit judicial murder that I have always been afraid to attempt it.

I am aware that the traitors in the South, if tried under our existing Constitution and laws, will not one of them be convicted. I should never attempt to try them for treason; I would try them as belligerents, under the law of nations and the laws of war.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. We have no reason to expect of the Administration any such trials.

Mr. STEVENS. I am stating what I would do if I were the Administration. Now, although I would not discourage trials for treason, I mention this to show that I am convinced that none of these traitors can ever be convicted of treason under our present Constitution and laws. And yet I would rather let every man of them run unpunished forever than to make a law now by which they could be punished. I think our Government would be endangered in its future existence, in its sense of justice, in its character before the world by conduct of that kind, more than it would by enduring the evil. I think the British Government suffered more from its murder of Lord Russell, although it was done by means of a court condemning him, than it would have done had he been suffered to escape. It was by just such contrivances as this that that judicial murder was effected, and by which the British Government suffered more than it would have done by the escape of forty traitors.

I think our Government better be careful how it tampers with the crime or the remedy. It better treat them as guilty partly of a political offense and partly of offenses malum in re than now to attempt to pass laws, because otherwise the malefactors may escape.

This professes to be a bill to make indefinite the prosecution of one of those offenses which of all others should be quieted by lapse of time. Although treason is as high a crime as can possibly be committed, yet there are generally so many engaged in the crime of treason and in rebellion that there must be some quieting law, and in my judgment there ought to be.

Now, it does not follow that every traitor will escape who is not prosecuted within three years of the time of the commission of the offense. The statute of limitations never runs in any case unless it is possible to enforce the remedy; it only runs from the time when it was possible to enforce it. For instance, I will refer to the men now in Europe, Benjamin, Slidell, and others; I do not suppose that anybody will say that while they were absent beyond seas the statute of limitation would run. The statute would begin to run when the time arrived that he could be prosecuted. But whether that be so or not, still, during the time of war, during the prosecution of the war, the crime continued; it was a continuing offense, and the offense continued up to the time when peace shall be proclaimed, which it never yet has been. I know that a gentleman in this city has made public a statement which he desired to have considered as equal to the decrees of James and Charles, as overruling the law. But it is of no more importance than so much waste paper.

The question of peace or war is yet to be decided by this body. I say there is no peace. This nation is still in a belligerent condition; and the conquered belligerents are within the power of the conqueror, to be dealt with as captives, not as criminals.

Therefore, sir, I can see no necessity for a measure of this sort; but if there were a necessity, I should certainly object to any alteration of the law as it now exists in regard to treason which would enable the Government to convict where it is confessed a conviction could not be obtained under the law as it stood at the time of the commission of the offense. I should be very glad to see condign punishment inflicted upon many of these men, not capital punishment; for in my youth I read Beccaria, and adopted to a great extent the principles which he maintains. I never realized the sufficiency of the atonement made by the execution of that magnificent leader of the rebellion, the miserable Wirz—a Dutchman, I believe, with a humpback—who was obeying the orders of his superiors, and who, in ordinary times when men were tried according to law, would never have been convicted, because his Government was answerable, not he. I do not believe that the starvation of thousands of Union prisoners is to be atoned for by the execution of one of the keepers—

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. This bill goes over until to-morrow, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be again entitled to the floor.

G. E. PICKETT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith reports from the Secretary of War and the Attorney General in compliance with a resolution of the 3d instant requesting the President to communicate to the House, "if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, the information asked for in a resolution of this House dated the 23d June last, and which resolution he has up to this time failed to answer, as to whether any application has been made to him for the pardon of G. E. Pickett, who acted as a major general of the rebel forces in the late war for the suppression of insurrection, and if so, what has been the action thereon; and also to communicate copies of all papers, entries, indorsements, and other documentary evidence in relation to any proceeding in connection with such application; and that he also inform this House whether, since the adjournment at Raleigh, North Carolina, on the 30th of March last, of the last board or court of inquiry convened to investigate the facts attending the hanging of a number of United States soldiers for alleged desertion from the rebel army, any further measures have been taken to bring the said Pickett or other perpetrators of that crime to punishment."

In transmitting the accompanying papers containing the information requested by the House of Representatives, it is proper to state that, instead of bearing date the 23d of June last, the first resolution was dated the 23d of July, and was received by the Executive only four days before the termination of the session.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 11, 1866.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF REGISTER OF TREASURY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting pursuant to the act of August 26, 1842, the report of the Register of the Treasury of receipts and expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1865; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHANS' HOME.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee for the District of Columbia, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, a bill (H. R. No. 848) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home," approved July 25, 1866, and whereby certain corporate rights are granted to Mrs. Julia B. Grant and others.

The amendment reported by the committee was read and agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the title of the bill was amended so as to read, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home,' approved July 25, 1866."

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be House bill No. 664, for the regulation of appointments to and removals from office, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to suggest some modifications to the bill as originally reported. As soon as I have done that I will yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.] I move the following to come in at the end of section two:

Provided, however, That so much of this section as makes the office vacant beyond the time of the refusal of the Senate to advise and consent to a re-nomination shall not be held to apply to cases of commissions to fill vacancies happening during the recess, and which, under the Constitution, are made determinable at the end of their next session.

Also strike out these words in section three:

And in case of the nomination of any other person or persons than the one so commissioned, and the refusal of the Senate to advise and consent thereto, the office shall not be considered as vacant upon the adjournment of the Senate, but the person so commissioned shall continue to hold and enjoy the same and exercise the functions thereof during the recess of Senate, and until he shall be either nominated and rejected or duly superseded by a new appointment, by and with the advice and consent of that body.

I now yield the floor to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I have been instructed by the joint select committee on retrenchment, to which this subject was referred by concurrent resolution of the two Houses, to report a bill to this House, and under those instructions I now move the bill which they instructed me to report as a substitute for the bill proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is printed, but the copies for the House are not yet in. They are expected in, and undoubtedly will be here before they will be needed.

The SPEAKER. The vote on the substitute will be reserved till the vote has been taken on the pending amendments for the perfection of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the substitute be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That every person (excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General) holding any civil office to which he has been appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts and excepting those specially excepted in section one of this act, shall, during the recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease; and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death, resignation, expiration of term of office, or other lawful cause, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter. And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled, as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such officer shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend the term of any office the duration of which is limited by law.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. HALE. I yield for that purpose with the consent of his colleague, by whose courtesy I hold the floor.

Mr. BROOMALL. I offer the following to come in at the end of the substitute:

That in all cases of filling vacancies in public offices by the President during the recess of the Senate where, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, appointments to such offices are required to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, it shall be the duty of the President to nominate persons to fill such offices to the Senate for confirmation within ten days after the commencement of its next session, or in cases of filling such vacancies already done, within ten days after the passage of this act. And no public officer so appointed shall receive any compensation for his services after the expiration of the said ten days, unless within that period his appointment shall have been presented to the Senate for confirmation.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person whose nomination has been rejected by the Senate shall be appointed by the President to fill a vacancy in the same office during the next recess of the Senate, such officer shall receive no compensation for his services; and where such appointment has heretofore been made after such rejection, the officer so appointed shall receive no compensation for his services after the passage of this act; and no officer appointed during the recess of the Senate shall receive compensation for his services after his appointment shall have been rejected by the Senate.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any public officer who shall pay or receive any moneys, or advise or connive at or consent to the payment of any moneys, in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and on conviction thereof, by impeachment or otherwise, shall be sentenced to removal from office, and shall pay to the United States a sum equal to the amount of moneys so paid or received, to be recovered, with costs, by action of debt, in the name of anybody who may institute such action, for the use and benefit of the United States.

I merely desire to say that some time during the discussion when the substitute comes up I wish to submit a few remarks in favor of my amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy the attention of the House for any considerable time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will excuse me, I desire to inquire as a question of order whether the question is to be taken on the amendments pending in the first instance? If so, I would rather the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] would postpone his remarks until we reach his amendment in the regular way.

The SPEAKER. The question will occur first on the various amendments that have been offered by unanimous consent, and then on the amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to waiving my right to the floor for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] can demand the previous question on his pending amendment, so as to have his bill perfected before the vote is taken on the substitute.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to submit a few remarks on this bill, and ask the gentleman whether he will yield to me now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman will wait till the proper time. It is not my purpose to force action on this bill by any means, and I shall be glad to hear suggestions and allow amendments to be offered. But it seems to me it is better to take up the questions in the order stated by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] desires to perfect his bill before allowing general debate on the bill; that is, to have a vote on the amendments.

Mr. KASSON. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] as the amendment proposed by me the other day is in order as printed, I will explain the object to be accomplished by it.

I observe in the first section there is no limitation of the power of removal by the provisions of the bill to the civil service of the United States. It covers by its terms the Army and Navy. Removals from both those branches of the service are effected frequently as the results of courts of inquiry and courts-martial. Therefore, I trust the gentleman will consent to insert after the words "United States" the words "in the civil service;" so that it will read, "That no officer of the United States in the civil service, appointed on the nomination of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be removable," &c.

I then propose in the fifth and sixth lines to strike out the words "the same agencies which concurred in his appointment," which seem to be a little indefinite, and to insert the words "impeachment and conviction, or by the President, with the consent of the Senate;" so that removals may not seem to be prohibited by the law as the result of impeachment.

I then propose in the seventh line, before the word "office," to insert, in conformity with what I have already said, the word "civil."

I also propose in the twelfth line, with the approval of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] to strike out the words "Attorney General" and insert the words "head of that Department under whose jurisdiction such officer may be." It is evident that it will otherwise be a mere matter of routine. The misconduct must be first known to the head of the Department, and on his representation the action of the President must be taken rather than on referring it to the Attorney General, who is himself obliged to depend upon the head of the Department for his information.

Then, at the conclusion of the section I propose to add a proviso which may or may not be agreeable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to except from the operation of the section the heads of the several Departments and their first assistants, who are their confidential officers. As I stated the other day, I hardly suppose it to be the opinion of either the committee or the House that a newly-elected President should not have the liberty when he is borne into office or in the course of his subsequent public action, if he shall find it expedient, to change his confidential advisers. It seems to me to be the theory of our Government that the President is the party who is held responsible for the administration of the executive branch of the Government, and that these officers are but his Secretaries. They are named as such, and in order to hold him responsible for their conduct, we must give him the power under this act of selecting these officers. And having that power and that responsibility, he should also have the right to remove them when they seem, in his judgment, to violate their duty. I may also add that in the confidential relations that they bear to the President in our foreign as well as domestic relations, it seems to me of the first consequence that the President should be at liberty to remove these advisers and appoint others, even in the vacation, without awaiting the consent of the Senate, on charges of misconduct which might render them liable to impeachment.

As it is in that case, so is it in the Departments themselves. My experience in the Executive Departments teaches me the importance of having confidential relations between the first officer of the Secretary and the Secretary himself. I do not think that in these two particulars we ought to interfere with what has been the uniform practice of the Government.

With these remarks I will now recur to the proposed amendments in their order, and inquire of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] whether they suit him. And first as to the limitation to the civil service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In regard to the suggestions of the gentleman from Iowa, I have to say that I do not know that it was the sentiment of the committee that any distinction would be proper between civil officers and officers in the military and naval service, since all these officers are appointable by the President now by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. We propose to enact, therefore, as well in regard to them as to officers in the civil service, that they shall not be removable at the mere arbitrary will of the Executive of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. If my friend will allow me, I will say that they are not now so removable. This in fact would limit the powers and regulations as they now exist. At present the President cannot remove at his will an officer of the Army or Navy, but after the action of a court of inquiry or court-martial they may be dismissed by the proceedings that appertain to those two branches of the service, and this limits the power as it now stands to dismiss officers as the result of the proceedings of courts-martial and courts of inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman will excuse me for differing from him in regard to the law. I think it has been ruled that the President may exercise this power, or at all events the practice has prevailed, in conformity to the opinions of Attorneys General, that he may turn an officer out of the military or naval service of the Government without inquiry in a court-martial or court of inquiry. By way of meeting this difficulty, Congress some two years ago, in 1863 or possibly in 1865, passed an act, to which I had occasion to refer in my opening remarks a few days ago, providing that where an officer in the military service was dismissed he should be entitled to demand a court of inquiry or court-martial, and if not accorded to him within six months, or if upon the granting of that request he should not be either condemned to death or dismissal from office, then he should be restored to the place from which the President had removed him. That shows what is the sentiment of the House on this very question, and it shows what the past practice has been; because this act was a commentary on that practice and was intended to put a stop to it.

Now, as soon as the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON] will show me sufficient cause for distinguishing between these two departments of the public service, then I will willingly yield. I felt inclined myself—and I may say it now—to suggest a provision in this bill to the effect that officers in these departments of the public service should hold their offices during good behavior, as I think they ought to do, but I did not think that the House would be prepared for its adoption, and therefore I did not think proper to offer it.

Mr. KASSON. I understand that in point of fact the law does not permit the President of the United States of his own will to remove an officer of the Army and Navy. That is admitted to be the present law, and that justifies the statement that I made that he cannot of his own will do it. Now this amendment proposed here, providing that no officer shall be removable except by impeachment or by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, does prohibit removals as the result of courts-martial as now allowed by law. I do not apprehend that my friend from Pennsylvania wishes to change the law in that particular; and if he does not, he should certainly limit the provision to the civil service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that the law was as stated by the gentleman, but I do not know that it would make any difference if we should superadd a provision of this sort giving to the Senate the power it exercises in analogous cases in the civil service. I think that the power would never be abused.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] in his speech the other day and again this morning, referred to the law passed at the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress in regard to the dismissal of officers in the military service by the President. I wrote that section, and had charge of the conference committee on the part of the House by which it was adopted on the last night of the session; and at the time of making the report submitted some remarks as the result of a tolerably full investigation of the subject, and at the request of several members I will say a few words on the subject of this bill so far as it relates to the removal of officers from the military and naval service.

The President of the United States, as a matter of fact, has from time to time since the foundation of the Government removed officers from the Army and Navy at his pleasure, though his constitutional right to do so has never been affirmed by a judicial decision. Indeed, his authority to do so has frequently been questioned; but the practice became so general that it was laid down in the Judge Advocate General's Digest of Opinions for 1865, and which exhibits both the practice and the opinion of the executive department on the subject, in the following paragraph:

"From the foundation of the Government, the President of the United States has been in the habit of summarily dismissing officers in the land and naval services. The power to do so seems to inhere in him under the Constitution as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy. The power of summary dismissal by the President does not depend for its authority upon the act of Congress, section seventeen, chapter 200, act of July 17, 1862; the act being simply declaratory of the right which has been exercised by the President since the earliest history of the Government."

Now, I look upon that as a doctrine most dangerous in theory and practice; and I wrote the section to which the gentleman has referred for the purpose of circumscribing the power of the President in that direction.

We were unable to secure the repeal of section seventeen of the law of 1862, by which the President was not only authorized but even requested to dismiss summarily and without trial any officer of the Army or Navy, when in his judgment it would be for the good of the service to do so. Now, under that law the President not only exercised that power himself, but he delegated the authority to the leading generals of the Army; and within my own knowledge one hundred and thirty commissioned officers in the Army of the Cumberland were dismissed without a trial within eleven months by reason of this summary power delegated by the President.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I would inquire whether it was not the fact that the general in command of the Army of the Cumberland, General Rosecrans, did dismiss officers upon his own motion, without any authority from the President?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir. The President of the United States, under the law of 1862, was not only authorized but requested to dismiss officers summarily when he thought it for the good of the service, and by an express order he authorized General Rosecrans and other generals to use the same power whenever in their judgment it would be proper to do so. General Rosecrans exercised the power, as he had a perfect right to do.

The objection I urged against it in the Thirty-Eighth Congress was that it was a terrible power, one which ought never to have been granted even to the President of the United States except in a great emergency, such as clearing out the traitors from our country at the beginning of the war.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Did not General Rosecrans dismiss officers from the Army without any express authority from the War Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; he was as I have already stated authorized by the President to do so whenever in his judgment the good of the service required it. It was the law, and not General Rosecrans that I complained of.

Now, what I desire to say on this point is, that according to this opinion of the Judge Advocate General, the President of the United States has, under the Constitution, without any legislation whatever, a right inherent in himself as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy to dismiss any military or naval officer without any trial whatever. I am free to say that in my opinion there never has been a practice or a principle more entirely subversive of the independence of our Army, and more destructive of all that is noble in its officers. If this doctrine be true, Andrew Johnson may dismiss from the service General Grant, General Sherman, Admiral Farragut, or any other officer of the Army or Navy. The section which has been referred to in this debate provides, that when the President dismisses an officer without a trial, the officer may demand a trial within six months thereafter, and if the court-martial shall not decide that he was properly dismissed he shall be restored.

So long as the seventeenth section of the act of 1862 is unrepealed the President can dismiss the highest or the lowest officer from the military or naval service; and there is but that one clause which was referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] that can in the slightest degree interfere with his power. Now, I regard it of the utmost importance that while we are regulating the question of removals and appointments we should see to it that no officer shall be dismissed from the military or naval service except by the sentence of a court-martial. I regret that we have not a bill prepared by which courts of inquiry shall be established for the trial of persons in the civil service, so that they may be dismissed by the verdict of such a court. I am informed that the distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] has drawn such a bill, to regulate the tenure of office in the civil service. I believe that such a measure would meet the necessities of our situation better than any other; but in the absence of such a bill as that, I hope the gentleman will consent to such an amendment to this section as shall provide that officers in the military and naval service shall be dismissed only on the verdict of a court-martial regularly convened according to law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the power of Congress to enact such a law as that to which the gentleman has referred. I recognize, too, the wisdom and propriety of such a measure. I do not, however, think that there is anything in the general language of the section under consideration which would interfere in any way with that act. It would, at all events by implication, authorize the President of the United States, with the concurrence of the Senate, to remove officers in the military and naval service. And I take it the power would be very safely lodged there, if they thought proper to exercise it. So that I do not regard this section as interfering at all with the act referred to, which is in many respects a very proper enactment.

Now, sir, with regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, which is to insert, I believe, in the fourth or fifth line an exception so as to provide that the clause shall not apply to cases of impeachments and convictions, or shall not be understood to take away the power in those cases. All I have to say is that such a provision is altogether unnecessary; because that power being secured by the Constitution we could not legislate it away even if we desired to do so. I would not object, however, to inserting in the fifth line the words, "on impeachment and conviction," which would effect the same object though not by the use of the same language.

The next suggestion of my friend from Iowa is to strike out the words "on the recommendation of the Attorney General," and leave the question to the heads of the Departments in which these officers respectively may be. I have no objection to this modification. I rather think it would be an improvement.

The last amendment suggested by the gentleman is a provision that this act shall not apply to the removal and appointment of the heads of the several Departments. I cannot of course assent to this amendment; for it would destroy the very essence of the bill. We aim to make the heads of these Departments, so far as practicable, independent of the Executive. We propose that these officers shall not hereafter hold their positions, as they have held them heretofore, at the mere will of the President; that their official lives shall not depend upon the mere breath of the Executive. We hold that such a tenure of office does not accord with the principles of republican government. One of our objects is to take away from the President and lodge with the heads of Departments, where it would seem appropriate to place it, the appointment of the inferior officers of the Government. Unless, however, the heads of Departments are to be made practically independent of the Executive, it would be idle to resort to any enactment of this sort; it would serve no practical purpose. Hence I cannot consent to the gentleman's amendment without sacrificing the very essence of the bill.

One word more. I suggested, Mr. Speaker, some amendments to the bill as originally submitted by the committee. I am not sufficiently conversant with the rules to know whether they were accepted as modifications or whether it is necessary that a vote shall be taken upon them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify any amendment offered by himself; but no amendment can be incorporated as a part of the bill without a vote of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My reason for suggesting the question was, that if those propositions are to be voted upon I would desire that the vote be taken before other gentlemen proceed with their remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presented various amendments to the bill. He has just modified them. They are now pending to be voted on, but in their modified form.

Mr. KASSON. I thought we were to pass upon the amendments to the first section in the first instance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose that will be the order.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will come up in regular order as applied to the bill, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests another way. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is the first in order.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say, then, that the point I have made has not been answered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the provisions proposed by him preclude all removals in the Army or Navy through the medium of courts-martial. My object is to avoid that, and to allow officers to be removed in that way, as has been the uniform custom of the Government, and to which I know there has been no opposition. That can be accomplished in two ways, by a proviso at the end of the section, or by moving my first amendment, so as to strike out the words "same agencies which concurred in his appointment," and insert "sentence of court-martial, or by impeachment and conviction, or by the President, with the consent of the Senate."

That will provide for the recognized mode of removal. If that should be satisfactory I will take the question in that form. I understand there is no objection to the amendment, and I will not take up any more of the time of the House.

Mr. HALE. Let me make an inquiry. I do not know that I understand the method of proceeding. I would like to know whether the general debate is to be postponed till the amendments have been disposed of or till after the substitute has been voted on? I learn there are gentlemen on the other side, as well as on this side of the House, who wish to discuss the bill, and I submit whether it would not be more appropriate to have the discussion before the vote is taken on the amendments. We ought, I think, to have the whole subject properly discussed before taking any vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as I am individually concerned I am not tenacious of any opinion I may have formed on this question. I know my opinions are wholly crude and immature, and I should like to profit by the opinion of the House. I know the question is surrounded with great practical difficulties, and I know it is much easier to point out defects than to make a bill that is perfect, which I think few gentlemen could be capable of doing. I should like, and I have no doubt that is the general wish, to collect the sense of the House on the subject. Therefore, unacquainted as I am with the parliamentary rules, all I can say is, I am willing to consent to bring about anything to facilitate this matter and enable the House to come to the debate at large on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair generally looks to the author of the measure to indicate the course to be pursued.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me the better plan would be first to take the vote on the amendments. I demand the previous question on the amendments to the original bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will that cut off modifications?

The SPEAKER. It will. The Chair knows of no way in which modifications can be made after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Cannot we have the previous question on each separate amendment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the rules be suspended and the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so we may consider this bill section by section.

Mr. WENTWORTH. How will that affect the debate postponed yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to the floor when the subject is resumed.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to make an amendment before going into committee. I desire to modify my amendment to the original bill by striking out all after the word "adjournment," in line ten, section two, to the end of the section, as follows:

And in no case shall any person who has been nominated by the President for any office and rejected by the Senate, or on whose nomination that body has failed or declined to act in the way of consent or refusal, be appointed or commissioned by him after the adjournment and during the recess of that body to hold the same office for which he had been previously nominated.

And by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That every person who has been or shall hereafter be nominated to the Senate for office, and who shall fail to receive the advice and consent of the Senate thereto, shall be incapable of holding any office under the United States for the term of three years after such rejection, unless two thirds of the Senate shall relieve him of such disability. The predecessor of any nominee rejected by the Senate shall still continue to hold his said office. Whenever any person has assumed office, and is discharging its duties on the nomination of the President before he has been confirmed by the Senate, on his rejection all the subordinates or deputies who have been appointed by him, or on his recommendation, shall vacate their places and cease to act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is that amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment. The House having waived the rule, we have got in the dilemma of having several amendments offered at once.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order. I had the floor, and moved the previous question. Since that time my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has proposed to go into Committee of the Whole, and other amendments are proposed to the bill. Am I not entitled to have a vote on my amendment?

The SPEAKER. By the rule any gentleman moving an amendment has a right to modify it previous to the vote. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has that right.

Mr. KASSON. I demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That is true, and the gentleman's amendment is still pending; but the Chair supposed the gentleman yielded to gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who moved to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; I insist on my demand for the previous question on my amendment, to strike out in section one, lines five and six, the words, "the same agencies which have concurred in his appointment," and to insert in lieu thereof "sentence of court-martial, or by impeachment and conviction, or by the President with the consent of the Senate."

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I now call for a vote on my second amendment: in line twelve to strike out the words "Attorney General" and insert "head of that Department under whose jurisdiction such officer may be." The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] has no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. My next amendment is a verbal one: in lines fourteen and fifteen to strike out the words, "have an opportunity of acting thereupon," and insert the word "act;" so that it will read, "until the Senate shall act thereon."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I have an amendment which has been discussed. It is in the form of a proviso, to come in at the end of the first section, as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to the heads of the several Executive Departments or their first assistants.

I have already stated the reasons which, in my judgment, render it important that this amendment should be adopted.

Even when a President of the United States has been elected in whom the people have confidence, you tie his hands by this bill against changing Cabinet officers or confidential advisers. You cannot carry on your executive Government without having a responsible head of it authorized to select his advisers and administrators. You cannot carry it on successfully in a condition of dissension between the President and his confidential advisers. You will have no claim to make a President responsible, as he constitutionally is, for the integrity of the administration of the Government, unless you give him the power to select the agents by whom he is to administer it in the way proposed, not only with the consent of the Senate, but in vacation. When it becomes necessary for him to make a change it seems to me he ought to have the power to do it. Sir, we must be careful in proceeding at this time under the excitement that naturally and justly agitates this House lest our action shall "return to plague the inventor." While we are changing the custom which has prevailed from Washington till now, and justly changing it, let us not go so far as to place the responsibility in the Secretaries and not in the President, for the scope of the bill reaches even that far now.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, and concurring with him in the general principles that he lays down, I wish to call his attention to an inquiry that suggests itself to me, why the first assistant in a Department should be excepted? In the bill prepared by the joint committee on retrenchment, and which my friend from New York [Mr. HALE] has, I believe, already moved as a substitute for this bill, we have borne in mind the principle now suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, and have excepted the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General. I do not know that it appears as clearly that the first assistants should be excepted. If, for instance, the First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury is excepted, why should not the Second Assistant Secretary be? They are both confidential officers. And so in the Post Office Department; if you except the First Assistant Postmaster General, why not except the Second and Third Assistant Postmasters General? They are each equally confidential officers subordinate to the Postmaster General, and their offices are made necessary from the fact that there are three divisions of duty in that Department. Although there may be a certain propriety in giving this exception to the person at the head of the whole Department, that does not apply to the assistant heads. I desire to retain the principle for which the gentleman contends, for I think it is sound and safe; but I prefer to limit the application to the heads of Departments alone.

Mr. KASSON. I will answer the gentleman with two reasons. In the first instance, the first assistant in the absence of his chief—and I call the gentleman's attention to that—is himself invited to a seat in the Cabinet. He is therefore, in that place, one of the confidential advisers of the President touching his Department. The other reason is, that the first assistant in all the Departments, so far as I know, is a confidential officer, and the other assistants are not; that there is a division in the classes of business in all the Executive Departments—I know there is in the Post Office Department—which renders the first assistant a confidential officer and does not render the others confidential to the chief of the Department. The first assistant is the one whom the chief consults intimately if he wants confidential information.

If the House will pardon me I will illustrate this point by my own experience. At the time the mails were suspended between the North and the South at the beginning of the war, when I was First Assistant Postmaster General, although I was not at all in charge of the dead-letter office of that Department, it was deemed expedient that the reports upon the information that was derived from those dead letters, which, under the ordinary operation of the law, were opened, should be made to me, and that the requisite action taken upon them should come through me. There were important acts of the Government depending on the disposition made of the information thus obtained.

I mention this to illustrate the point that there are confidential relations existing between the head of a Department and his first assistant which would justify him in demanding of Congress, and justify Congress in granting him one officer upon whom he can rely implicitly as his confidential friend. Knowing the necessity of this confidential relation between the Secretary and his first officer under the law, just as between the President and his Secretaries, I ask that we shall except these two classes of officers from the operation of this law. This bill would deprive the President of any choice of his confidential advisers without the approval of another branch of the Government.

That is all I have to say upon the subject, and I shall of course very cheerfully abide by the action of the House.

A MEMBER. Does the first assistant act as Secretary in Cabinet meetings?

Mr. KASSON. In the absence of his chief he takes his place, and I have myself sat in the Cabinet of the President as First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. GARFIELD. In view of the tangled condition of this bill and the many amendments offered, I suggest that it be referred to Committee of the Whole and made the special order, and I will then move to go into Committee of the Whole upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not see the object of that. We can by unanimous consent consider the bill as in the Committee of the Whole of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there are probably twenty amendments pending or ready to be offered—amendments both verbal and substantial—and I think we can dispose of them much better in committee than in the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. By unanimous consent we can consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then modify your motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will make this proposition, then, that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That will allow five minutes' debate for and against amendments until the bill is open to general debate.

Mr. FINCK. Will there be any general debate allowed on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who has charge of the bill, has stated that he proposes to allow general debate after the bill shall have been perfected.

No objection being made, the proposition of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to.

The first question was upon the following amendment, moved by Mr. KASSON:

Add to the first section the following:
Provided further, That this section shall not apply to the heads of the several Executive Departments or their first assistants.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It will be observed by the House when they come to look at the amendment which has been moved by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that it is a revival of the old question of 1789. It will be recollected by those familiar with the legislative history of this nation, that in the First Congress the question was discussed at great length as to the powers of Congress under the Constitution to associate the Senate with the President in the matter of removals. I think a majority of both Houses, as constituted at that time, would have said that the thing ought to have been done if it could be done constitutionally. But it was resisted by Mr. Madison, and the majority sided with him, though it was a small majority—a majority of one in the Senate. It was held by Mr. Madison that the power to remove was a power which passed by the general grant in the Constitution, assigning the executive powers of this nation to or lodging them in the President of the United States.

The argument of the minority in that case was that the power to remove was an incident of or necessarily inhered in the power to appoint. Yet the opinion of the majority, as advocated by Mr. Madison, prevailed. Now we all know, and I think no lawyer will dispute the assertion, that the idea of the minority of that First Congress has been sustained by the only judicial decision we have since had upon that question, in the case Ex relatione Heenan, reported in 13 Peters, and familiar of course to all the lawyers of this House.

As I have already remarked, we are coming back again to the question which was before the First Congress. I think it has always been regarded by the best lawyers of the nation since that time that the decision of Congress in 1789 was wrong. And the opinion has generally prevailed that that decision was obtained in consequence of the weight and influence of the personal character of our first Chief Magistrate.

Now, in addition to the fact of the prevalence of an opinion of this sort since that time, I think I may also say it has been quite as generally lamented that any such decision has ever been made. And the desire has been expressed time and time again, by leading men in both Houses of Congress, to bring the Government back to its true principles, by placing this matter of appointment to and removal from office under the control of the people through their Congress.

Now, in my mind there is no question that in making these removals, which gentlemen would allow the President to make, he is exercising power that the Constitution never conferred upon him. As I remarked, this is the very question which arose in the First Congress. Unfortunately the decision was then made one way, and we propose now to reverse it upon the first opportunity that has ever been presented to us, and the last perhaps that may ever be offered in our history as a nation.

Mr. HALE. I would inquire if it is in order to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON?]

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "or their first assistants."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. KASSON as amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 38, noes 50; no quorum voting.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment as amended.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KASSON and WILLIAMS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 46.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On this question I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

On the motion there were—ayes 47, noes 57.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to; and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move further to amend the first section by inserting after the word "public," in the eighth line, the word "service;" so as to read, "where the interests of the public service may make it necessary," &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move also a verbal amendment: to strike out in the twenty-second line the words "advising and consenting;" and insert in lieu thereof the words "refusing to advise and consent;" so that the clause will read:

And in case of the refusal of the Senate to concur in the removal, either by a direct vote thereon, or by refusing to advise and consent to the appointment of the person so nominated, &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That amendment will give the clause precisely the contrary meaning to what is intended. If the gentleman will examine the text he will find it right as it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have examined it carefully, and I think the amendment is necessary; but as other gentlemen appear to object to the amendment I will withdraw it.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

And provided further, That in all cases where an appointment has been made by the President during the recess of the Senate, but the party so appointed has not been confirmed by the Senate and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office before the passage of this act, then and in that case the occupant of the office shall continue to hold and exercise the same until his successor has been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, a few words in explanation of this amendment may be necessary. It is designed to cover a class of cases not otherwise provided for in the bill. There have been cases in which an appointment has been made during the recess of the Senate, notice of the appointment given, and the commission made out, but either from delay in filing the bond or taking the oath of office, or from the remoteness of the locality, as is the case in my own district, the new appointee has not up to the present time entered upon the duties of the office, and probably will not do so until after the passage of this bill. This amendment proposes to cover such cases by providing that if at the time of the passage of this act the former incumbent is still in the office he shall continue to exercise the duties of the office until the new appointee is confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. If I rightly understand the purport of this amendment, it is open to objection as conflicting with the provisions of the Constitution. I ask that it be read again.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota whether his amendment contemplates appointments to vacancies happening during the recess of the Senate, or appointments to fill vacancies created by removals.

Mr. DONNELLY. It is designed to meet the question which might arise, whether the vacancy commenced from the date of the commission or from the time when the party enters upon the duties of the office.

Mr. BINGHAM. All I desire to say is, that if a vacancy happens during the recess of the Senate and the President makes an appointment to fill the vacancy and issues a commission, the Constitution itself defines the duration of that appointment. The express declaration of the Constitution is:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

If the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota contemplates in such cases an extension of the term of office beyond the end of the present session of the Senate, it is in direct conflict with the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting the word "civil" before the word "officer" in the third line of the first section; so that the clause will read, "that no civil officer of the United States appointed on the nomination of the President," &c.

My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] was entirely mistaken in assuring the House that there is now no law protecting officers in the military and naval service from arbitrary removal by the President. I remember very well the effort which he made in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, when he was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to secure the passage of such an enactment; and I cooperated with him in his endeavors to attain that object. But although failing in that Congress, in this Congress the effort was renewed, and such provision was inserted in the Army bill passed by this House reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. But when that failed, or seemed likely to fail altogether in the Senate, I took care to select from that Army bill some two or three sections involving matters kindred to this, and particularly this one, and succeeded in getting it incorporated into an appropriation bill. And the fact is this is the law as it now stands, as gentlemen will find by referring to the fifth section of the bill passed at the last session making appropriations for the support of the Army, &c. The section is as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That section seventeen of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army," approved July 17, 1862, and a resolution entitled "A resolution to authorize the President to assign the command of troops in the same field or department to officers of the same grade without regard to seniority," approved April 4, 1862, be, and the same are hereby, repealed. And no officer in the military or naval service shall, in time of peace, be dismissed from the service except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect, or in commutation thereof.

As the law stands now, there is no necessity for doing that which ordinarily I think is untenable; to mix up our legislation in regard to the civil service with our legislation in regard to military matters. Officers of the Army and Navy are now protected from peremptory dismissal, and they can only be deprived of their commissions by sentence of a court-martial or by commutation of some more severe sentence, such as the sentence of death.

As there is no necessity for making a single provision in this beyond the civil service, I hope it will be limited to that line of Government patronage, to the regulation of officers appointed in the exercise of Government patronage for civil service.

It is limited, it is true, to time of peace; and there is, I think, another proper discretion exercised by the legislative power. If this bill passes without limiting it to civil officers, then in time of war, in case of cowardice in the presence of the enemy, or in case of any other flagrant offense, the arbitrary power which will give safety and perfect control to the war-making power over the officers who are operating in making that war must be done away with and everything come within the provision of this law. I hope the law in regard to naval and military officers will stand as it is now, allowing peremptory and arbitrary dismissal in time of war, but that when war has ended, in time of peace, it shall be only on sentence of court-martial.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If my friend had adverted to the amendment already adopted on motion of the gentleman from Iowa, he would have noticed that removals or dismissals shall only be by sentence of court-martial. If he makes it read that no civil officer shall be removable except under these circumstances he will then see what will be the effect of his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment can only be cumulative as it is now provided for by law. If this bill has been so amended it only accomplishes the same thing in less precise way than is now provided by law. It is another argument why we should confine this bill to its application to civil officers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman would make it read so that no civil officers shall be removable except by court-martial.

Mr. SCHENCK. That can be reconsidered so as to make this apply to civil officers exclusively. If the motion prevails which I now make, and I do not move it pro forma, I will move to reconsider the vote by which the words "court-martial," &c., were inserted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad to know what I had not observed before, that on the last night of the last session a section was got into the Army bill repealing that section from which the President seems to derive authority to dismiss without trial.

But I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that for the very reason which the gentleman has stated induced him to put in the word "civil," I hope it will not be inserted. For he himself confesses that as the law now stands, although the President cannot remove summarily an officer of the Army in time of peace, he may do it in time of war. Now, at the very time when officers most need protection of their rights by court-martial, when the passions of a superior officer may be most likely to seek their removal without trial, the gentleman proposes to allow the President to remove them summarily. I hope that all officers of the Government will have by this bill a ground to stand upon, and that none of them, whether civil or military, may be removed at the will and pleasure of any officer of the United States.

I hope therefore that the word "civil" will not be inserted here, but that the provision will be made even more sweeping than the gentleman has shown the law now to be in reference to military men, so that neither in time of war nor of peace shall any officer of the Army or Navy be dismissed from service without either a decision of a court-martial or by the President with the consent of the Senate.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK to insert the word "civil" in section one, line three, there were—ayes 71, noes 29.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I propose to amend the first section in the sixteenth line, by striking out the word "ten" and inserting "twenty," so that it will read, "and it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the next assemblage of that body, to report to it the fact of such suspension." This question was considered in the select committee on retrenchment, and I understand the amendment is satisfactory to the gentleman who has charge of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move further to amend by adding at the close of the section the following:

But the salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so temporarily commissioned and performing the duties of such office.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move a further amendment, to come in at the end of the section after the last amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the President, in case he shall be satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized at any time before reporting such suspension, as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

It simply enables the President when he shall be satisfied that the suspension has been unduly made to revoke the suspension without going through the form of sending it to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I take it for granted he can do it at any rate before he has made his report. It will do no harm, however.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to strike out certain words which were inserted in the first section. In consequence of opposition to the amendment which I proposed, to insert the word "civil," I moved to amend by inserting the words "sentence of court-martial, or by impeachment and conviction, or by the President with the consent of the Senate;" which was adopted. The word "civil" having since been inserted, it becomes necessary to strike out the words "sentence of court-martial or by."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next amendment in order is that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] to strike out all after the word "adjournment," in section two, line three, and insert what will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

That every person who has been, or shall hereafter be, nominated to the Senate for office, and who shall fail to receive the advice and consent of the Senate thereto, shall be incapable of holding any executive office under the United States for the term of three years after such rejection, unless two thirds of the Senate shall relieve him of such disability. The predecessor of any nominee rejected by the Senate shall still continue to hold his said office. Whenever any person has assumed office, and is discharging its duties on the nomination of the President before he has been confirmed by the Senate, on his rejection all the subordinates or deputies who have been appointed by him, or on his recommendation, shall vacate their places and cease to act.

Mr. STEVENS. The present bill provides that the President shall not appoint a rejected party to the same office. Now, sir, that does not satisfy me. We are acting upon this question as if the constitutional requirements had not been followed and we are providing how hereafter these offices are to be disposed of. We know, for I may refer to that now, that since the last session of Congress a class of the meanest men that God ever overlooked in making mankind have been appointed to office and are now awaiting the rejection or confirmation of the Senate. I have no doubt that a great many of them will be rejected, but if the President is allowed to appoint them to any other offices he will reward them all. He understands taking care of just such men; they are naturally his wards; and although he may not be allowed to appoint them to the same offices, he will roll them over into something else that will be as distasteful to the public mind as their present appointments. Now, if they have been tried and found wanting by the Senate give them one year to purify themselves before they shall be appointed to any other executive office, and some gentlemen think it will take more than that. I must, therefore, insist that these men shall be punished, if you please, for having consented to the meanness of becoming reptiles to crawl into office through such slimy places as they have done during the time that we have been "swinging around the circle," [laughter,] and that everything done by them shall be considered as a nullity. I confess to my desire to punish these men by refusing them not only these offices, but all others. I have no objection if it is looked upon as a little stigma in their neighborhood. I think that the fact of their acceptance of office is evidence that they are too mean to hold it, too dishonest to be trusted with it.

Mr. HALE. I rise to oppose the amendment. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has been complimented by several of his associates upon this floor as having suddenly become conservative. [Laughter.] I was delighted to witness it and welcome his accession to those ranks; but I regret to say, that with the zeal common to neophytes he goes far beyond what those heretofore considered as in some measure sustaining the President have been willing to go. The gentleman proposes to put into the hands of the President alone, without the concurrence of anybody whatever, such power as I think never was intrusted to any one man in this Government. For, let us consider, if the President should nominate any person to any office who shall be rejected by the Senate—and the gentleman will bear in mind that it does not necessarily presuppose the consent of the person nominated—that rejection renders the person so nominated incapable of holding any office except when relieved of the disqualification in one particular manner.

Mr. STEVENS. I will run the risk of being punished in that way.

Mr. HALE. We all know that the gentleman is competent for almost any position on the face of the earth, and yet there may be positions for which, if the President in hostility should think fit to nominate him, the Senate might deem him unfitted. He might not, for instance, be considered by the Senate a suitable person to command a regiment, or to be general-in-chief of the Army, or a captain in the Navy; and yet the President has nothing to do but to send in the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for such an office, and if the Senate, deeming him not particularly qualified for service in that line, should reject him, we know how much we should all regret his invaluable services here. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. In that case I should come to the gentleman and ask him to unite with others to get the Senate to take off the disability, so that I might take the office which he would desire me to hold, and I am sure they would do it.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman does not mean that; he would not come to me for such a purpose, because I should have no weight in that line. But the House cannot fail to see the absurdity to which the amendment of the gentleman leads. If the President desires to get rid of General Grant he has nothing to do but to nominate him for Chief Justice and let the Senate reject him for that office, and the office of General is vacant and the present holder disqualified.

I cannot believe that the gentleman from Pennsylvania seriously proposes to put this power into the hands of the President, and although I have heretofore to some extent been considered a mild supporter of the President, I cannot go that length. I trust, therefore, that his amendment will be rejected.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 182, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Farquhar, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hotchkiss, Kelley, Kelson, McClurg, Starr, Stevens, Van Aernam, Hamilton Ward, and Stephen F. Wilson—18.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported to the Committee on Appropriations a bill making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the special order for Thursday next after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I give notice that I desire to reserve the point of order in regard to all new legislation, and such matter that may be in the bill just referred to the Committee of the Whole.

EMPLOYÉS IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, also introduced a joint resolution granting additional compensation to certain employés of the Executive Departments in Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. LATHAM. I ask leave to withdraw from the Military Committee the papers in the case of Daniel Cole, and have them referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. They were referred to the Military Committee by mistake.

Leave was granted accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LATHAM also asked and obtained leave of absence for two days for his colleague, Mr. CHESTER D. HUBBARD.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, (at twenty minutes before four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BOYER: The petition and papers of James Todd, administrator of Samuel P. Todd, deceased.

By Mr. CONKLING: The petition of Rev. Dr. Gray, and others, asking modification of taxes paid by clergymen, teachers, and certain others.

Also, the petition of manufacturers of and workers in ivory, horn, bone, &c., asking change of the tariff.

By Mr. DARLING: The petition of marine underwriters of the city of New York, for an appropriation to remove the wreck of the steamer Scotland at Sandy Hook.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. WINDOM: A bill to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 12, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and takes this opportunity to lay before the Senate the memorial of William Boyd, of Washington city, District of Columbia, the substance of which, stated in his own words, is:

"I humbly ask your honorable body that you make no distinctions in regard to either color or sex if you should think proper to extend the elective franchise in this District, which I beg of your honorable body to do immediately; so that hereafter there shall be no distinction of race or sex. I am among those who believe that slavery will never die until all laws are so constructed as to hold all mankind as equal before the law."

As there is no committee before which this subject is pending, it being under debate in the Senate, this petition will be received and laid on the table if there be no objection.

Mr. LANE presented the petition of Cincinnati W. Harper and Clarence C. Harper, children and heirs-at-law of the late John Harper, deceased, praying for compensation for the use and occupation of their land by the United States Government, in the county of Norfolk, State of Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of officers in the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Adeline M. Gould, mother of Eugene M. Gould, late a private of company F, third Rhode Island cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That Eaton & Gage, contractors with the Navy Department to supply the different navy-yards with certain articles, have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate their petition and papers praying that their account may be settled upon principles of equity.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. WILSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes," approved July 16, 1866.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 148) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cyrus W. Field; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

WILLIAM HICKEY.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration, if there be no objection:

Resolved, That the amount directed to be paid to the legal representatives of the late William Hickey for funeral expenses, &c., by Senate resolution of July 9, 1866, be paid by the Secretary of the Senate out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on its consideration, not the disposition of the resolution. The Chair hears no objection to its present consideration.

Mr. WILSON. We have already passed a resolution directing the payment of this money, but we did not provide that it should be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My own impression is that that resolution passed without very much consideration.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator would like to have this resolution referred I shall not object to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better be referred. I understand that the benefit to be received from it—it is a mere gift, at any rate—will be received, in part at least, by young gentlemen who ran away from this city and went into the rebel service, and that the whole family, with the exception of Mr. Hickey himself, who was very quiet and a very excellent officer, were rather notorious for their secession proclivities and conversations. At any rate, I think that matter had better be understood before we act on this resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I certainly have no objection to its going to a committee if any Senator desires that course to be taken. Whatever may be the views of these young men, the sons of Colonel Hickey, he himself was an officer of the Senate for many years, and I think served it with great fidelity. I believe he was a true Union man, devoted to the country, and was so throughout the war, and was entirely faithful.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know anything to the contrary, and do not even suspect anything to the contrary. What I mean to say is, that I have been informed—how true it is I do not know—that the benefit of this resolution will go to persons who really were engaged in the rebel service and left the District for that purpose. If that is so this money ought not to be paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine move the reference of the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS DURING THE RECESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether any person appointed to an office required by law to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who was commissioned during the recess of the Senate previous to the assembling of the present Congress to fill a vacancy, has been continued in such office and permitted to discharge its functions, either by the granting of a new commission or otherwise, since the end of the session of the Senate on the 28th day of July last, without the submission of the name of such person to the Senate for its confirmation, and particularly whether a surveyor or naval officer of the port of Philadelphia has thus been continued in office without the consent of the Senate.

There being no objection the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by adding to the inquiry, "and if any such officer has exercised such functions whether he has received any pay or salary therefor."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the amendment, and will accept it. It is in my power to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of the mover to accept the amendment, and the resolution will be amended accordingly. The question is on the resolution. The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 879) relating to brevets in the Army of the United States.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON, his Secretary, announced that the President had to-day approved and signed an act (S. No. 327) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharine F. Winslow.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, by striking out in the second line of its first section the word "male" before "person." Upon this question the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not believe that the pending amendment to the bill extending the franchise to women in the District of Columbia, offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, was designed to be carried out into practical legislation at this time or in this connection. I think it was rather intended to elicit an expression of opinion from members of the Senate upon the general proposition involved. If it were to go into practical effect, I am one of those who believe that it would be necessary to accompany it by a good deal of other legislation to prevent it from degenerating into abuse and perhaps corrupting many of those it designs to advance in position and influence. But accepting the matter in the light which I have stated, for one I am willing to express an opinion very freely on the subject. I have to say then, sir, here on the floor of the American Senate, I stand for universal suffrage, and as a matter of fundamental principle do not recognize the right of society to limit it on any ground of race, color, or sex. I will go further and say that I recognize the right of franchise as being intrinsically a natural right; and I do not believe that society is authorized to impose any limitation upon it that does not spring out of the necessities of the social state itself.

These may seem, Mr. President, extreme views, but they conform to the rigid logic of the question, and I defy any Senator here who abides that logic to escape that conclusion. Sir, I have been shocked, yes, shocked, during the course of this debate at expressions which I have heard so often fall from distinguished Senators, and apparently with so little consideration of what the heresy irresistibly leads to, saying in substance that they recognize in this right of franchise only a conventional or political arrangement that may be abrogated at will and taken from any; that it is simply a privilege yielded to you and I and others by society or the Government, which represents society; that it is only a gracious boon from some abstract place and abstract body for which we should be proud and thankful; in other words, that it is not a right in any sense, but only a concession.

Mr. President, I do not hold my liberties by any such tenure. On the contrary, I believe that whenever you establish that doctrine, whenever you crystalize that idea in the public mind of this country, you ring the death-knell of American liberties. You take from each, what is perhaps the highest safeguard of all, the conviction that there are rights of men embracing their liberty in society, and substitute a skepticism on all matters of personal freedom and popular liberties which will lay them open to be overthrown whenever society shall become sufficiently corrupted by partyism or whenever constitutional majorities shall become sufficiently exasperated by opposition.

Mr. President, so important, yea so crucial, so to speak, do I deem this position, that I trust I may be pardoned by the Senate if I refer to the abstract grounds, the invincible agreement upon which I deem it to rest. I do this the more readily because in my belief the metaphysical always controls ultimately the practical in all the affairs of life. Now, what are abstract rights? And are there any intrinsic necessary conditions that go to constitute liberty in society? I believe that there are, and that those conditions are as determinable as the liberties they protect.

The foundation upon which all free government rests, and out of which all natural rights flow as from a common center, has been well stated by Mr. Herbert Spencer in a late work on Social Statics, to be "the liberty of each limited by the like liberty of all." As the fundamental truth originating and yet circumscribing the validity of laws and constitutions, it cannot be stated in a simpler form. As the rule in conformity with which society must be organized, and which distinguishes where the rightful subordination terminates, and where tyranny, whether of majorities or minorities, begins, it cannot be too much commended. "Every man has freedom to do all that he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man," is stated as the law of just social relationships, and in it the rights of individual liberty of thought, of speech, of action find their complete expression. It will be observed that equality is the essence of it all. In fact any recognition of an inequality of rights is fatal to liberty.

Observe, furthermore, that those rights inherent in the individual, are part of his existence, and not the gift of any man or aggregation of men. If they were, equality under a despotism might find its justification in the postulate just as well as equality under a republic. Cæsarean democracy could claim like paternity with American democracy. The assumption, then, that freedom in any of its forms is a privilege conceded by society is utterly unwarrantable, because society itself is a concession from the individual—the liberty of each limited by the like liberty of all—and such limitation is what society or Government represents. And it is in this sense, and flowing from this axiom, that the rights of franchise originally appertain to all alike; for franchise is in itself nothing more than a mode of participating in the common Government, and represents only the interest each has therein. That limitations may attach thereto, just as they attach to freedom of speech or freedom of action, is perfectly true; but they must be equal limitations, applicable to all alike, growing out of the social relation, and not leveled at the inherent right of any individual or class. Thus the exclusion of criminals from the franchise, the designation of terms of minority as connected with the exercise of political duties, the regulation of the admission to citizenship of persons coming from foreign countries, find their justification in a principle which, so far from recognizing in Government or society a purely arbitrary control of the rights and exercise of self-government or personal liberty, brings it down within rigid and narrow limits of equality and necessity.

There are those, and I am sorry some such have arisen in the Senate to-day, who seek to escape this conclusion, and put the blush upon all free government by affirming, as I have said, that the right of franchise is a purely political right, neither inherent nor inalienable, and may be divested by the citizen or the State at will. The consideration mentioned, that the right of franchise is neither more nor less than the right of self-government as exercised through a participation in the common government of all, shows, however, that if it be not a natural right it will be difficult to say in what a natural right consists. Indeed, it is perhaps the most natural of any of our rights, inasmuch as its denial is the denial of all right to personal liberty, for how can such latter right exist when the right to maintain it among men and the societies of men is denied? Again, if the right to share in the joint government is not inherent, from whence does it come? Who can give the right to govern another? and how can any give that he has not got? Society is but the aggregate of individuals, and in its authority represents only the conceded limitations on all, not any reservoir of human rights, otherwise human rights would vary with every changing association.

Still again, if the right of a man as regards Government can be divested either by himself or Government at will, then Government has no limit to its rightful tyranny—it may divest not only one man, but a hundred or a thousand; indeed, why not all but the chosen few or the imperial one, thus arriving logically at oligarchic or despotic rule. And if a man may divest himself of this right, what right is sacred from his renunciation? That a man may refuse to exercise any right is true, and that in changing his abode he may sever his political and social relations is equally true; but these facts only prove that his natural rights inhere in his person, go with him in his movement, subject always to be exercised under the conditions and limitations before recited. After all, to demonstrate the utter falsity and pernicious consequence of the idea that the right to share in the common Government (which is only a synonym for the right of franchise) is a privilege to be farmed out by Government at discretion and to whom it chooses, it is only necessary to ask, if that be so, whence comes the right to representation? Wherein is the foundation for any democratic society predicated on the rights of individuals? That various mixed Governments do undertake to limit the franchise to the few as a privilege coming from the body-corporate has nothing to do with the question, for I am discussing now rights, not practices; republics, not aristocracies.

Such I believe, Mr. President, to be the principles on which our personal rights, our liberties in society repose. It is true the argument carries us very far, but not further, I apprehend, than republican government must go whenever it undertakes to conform its practice to its logic. And having examined the general reasoning that controls the whole question of franchise, let me now advert more particularly to the bearing of that argument upon the proposition submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know that many affirm that the results to which such reasoning as that I have adduced would lead are themselves conclusive against its force. But that is scarcely a fair mode of judging of the strength and invincibility of any argument, far less one touching interests so momentous in character.

To give the objection its greatest force it may be said, "if suffrage be the right of all men, why is not also the right of all women, of all children?" "Are they not equally interested in good government, and are they not equally capable of expressing through a vote their wish in relation to public affairs?" "Do they not come within the category, the equal liberty of each limited by the like liberty of all, and if so, can the infringement of their liberty by disfranchisement be justified?"

To such questions, and in fact to the whole inquiry, it may be replied that as freedom finds the expression of its limits in the social relation itself, so long as the marital and paternal state remain as they are now, essential parts to that social relation, so long will there be more or less of constraint involved in their expression through governmental forms. And it may be added also that in so far as marriage and paternity establish an identity of interest between husband and wife, or parent and child, so far the participation of the one in the government is virtually the participation of both, the franchise of one the franchise of both. Such identity is not always true or equable, but it nevertheless approximates truth, and is therefore the more readily accepted as such in practical affairs.

That the rights of women, however, are intrinsically the same with those of men, may not be consistently denied; and that all the advance of modern civilization has been toward according them greater equality of condition is attested by the current history of every nation within its pale. Rights of married women and minors are constantly finding new expression in our laws and new force in our public opinion, which is only law in process of formation. While it will not be necessary, therefore, to go into those deeper and anterior questions of social life involving the substitution of voluntary for compulsory modes which are agitating so profoundly the intellect of this age, it is important to note that of the three great departments of control in human affairs, namely: morals or conscience, manners or society, government or laws, the two former have been unreservedly conceded to the full and equal participation of women. And furthermore, I venture to affirm with all confidence, that although the social relation, as it embraces a recognition of family dependence, may present obstacles to an equal influence under present forms of government and to the full exercise of citizen rights on the part of women, yet that the purity, the refinement, the instinctive reading of character, the elegant culture of the women of our land, if brought to bear upon the conduct of political affairs, would do much to elevate them in all their aims, and conform them to higher standards of justice.

Mr. President, I have listened in vain for the argument on which is predicated the assertion that sex alone affords a rightful ground for exclusion from the rights of franchise. I do not find anything to justify that view, even in the position of those who contend that franchise is a mere political privilege and not founded in any right, for that would apply to men equally as to women, and does not touch the question of relative rights. The position would still remain to be established why the franchise should be given to the one and not to the other. It would remain still to present grounds of principle on which that right as such may be denied to her and not denied to him.

I have heard reasons of policy, reasons of sentiment, reasons of precedent advanced to justify this exclusion; but in all frankness, and with no disrespect intended, I must say that those which have been presented during this debate seem to me trivial, illogical, and contradictory of each other.

First, it has been said that if women are entitled to the rights of franchise they would correspondingly come under the obligation to bear arms. But, sir, I do not know that there is any necessary connection between the rights of franchise and the requirement of service in your Army. On the contrary I do know that all Governments which have existed among men do now recognize the fact that there is no necessary connection between the two; and I do know that no Government has more distinctly recognized that portion than the Government of the United States. Are there not large classes even among men in this country who are exempt from service in our armies for physical incapacity and for other reasons? And if exemptions which appertain to males may be recognized as valid, why not similar exemptions for like reason when applied to females? Does it not prove that there is nothing in the argument so far as it involves the question of right? There are Quakers and other religious sects; there are ministers of the gospel; persons having conscientious scruples; indeed, all men over a certain age who under the laws of many of the States are released from service of that character. Indeed, it is the boast of their Republic that ours is a volunteer military establishment. Hence I say there is nothing in the position that because she may not be physically qualified for service in your Army therefore you have the right to deny her the franchise on the score of sex.

It might be an inquiry of very great interest and worthy of being pursued much further than I have the time or the ability to pursue it just now, how far, if the ballot should be extended to all the women in this land, it would go to modify existing opinion and action and relationship among States so as to obliterate in a great degree the very necessity for your Army and Navy. I believe, sir, that a very large majority of the wars that have been waged in this world have been wars that were condemned by the moral sense of the nations on both sides, wars that would have been terminated forthwith if that moral sense could have had its rightful influence in controlling the affairs of Government; and I say it is a question that is worthy of consideration how far such an element introduced into your political control would go to obviate these barbarous resorts to force which you now deem essential and which we all deplore, but which it is a folly if not a crime to say constitute a reason woman should be denied any right to which she would be otherwise entitled.

Mr. President, a second objection has been taken to any extension of the franchise in this direction, and it is one that perhaps has more seeming force in it than the other.

It has been said with a great deal of pathos by the Senator from New Jersey: what, would you have your wives and your daughters mingle in the scenes at the election-booths, go into the riotous demonstrations that attend upon the exercise of the ballot, and become participants in the angry and turbulent strifes that are so characteristic of our political modes? I say with frankness that I would not have wife or daughter mingle in any such scene; I would be loth to have their purity and their virtue exposed to such demoralized surroundings, surroundings that are only too apt to corrupt even the males that mingle in the political arena. But, sir, I contend that that is an argument against the ballot and the hustings and the polling-booths, and not against the rights of woman. It is an argument against those corruptions that you have permitted to grow and fasten upon your political methods and appliances and not an argument against her rights as contrasted with the rights of man. What! usurp an exclusive control, then degrade the modes of exercising power, and after that say the degradation is reason why the usurpation should continue unchallenged. What profanation of the very powers of thought is that! On the contrary I am prepared to say that I see no reason, I never have seen any reason, why there might not be changes introduced in your modes of taking the sense of the community, of ascertaining public opinion upon public measures, of making selection even of its individuals for important offices, that would conform them far more to those refinements and those elevations which should characterize and control them, purifications that might render them appropriate for participation in by the most refined of the land, whether male or female.

I see no reason why it should not be done. The change has been constant already from the very rudest forms to the forms which we now have, and which I am sorry to say are sufficiently rude to disgrace the civilization of the age. Why not further amelioration and adaptation? Are we to have no progress in the modes of government among men? Are we and future generations to be ever imprisoned in the uncouth alternative of monarchical or democratic forms as they now obtain? I cannot believe it. For five years past we have had revolution enough among us to satisfy even the most conservative that the present is no ultimatum, either of form or substance, in political or social affairs. I will go further and venture to say that there are now seething underneath all the forms of this Government, revolutions still more striking than any one of us have yet witnessed. Beneath all these methods and appliances of administrations and controls among men I believe there is under our very feet a heaving, unsteady ocean of aroused questioning in which many modes now practiced will sink to rise no more, and out of which other adaptations will emerge that will render far more perfect the reflection of the will of the people; that will perhaps represent minorities as well as majorities; that will disarm corruptions by dispensing with party organizations. It is the very witching hour of change.

And, sir, I do not dread change. Why should we? Is not change the primal condition on which all life is permitted to exist? Change is the very essence of all things pure, the sign and token of the divinity that is within us, and conservatism per se is infidelity against the ordination of God. When, therefore, we see such change in all things that are around us, in fashions and customs and laws and recognitions and intellectualities, even to the supremest generalizations of science, in all things save the elemental principles of our being and by consequence of our rights, why shall we say that these forms into which we have cast administration and government shall not obey the great law of development and take upon themselves ameliorations better suited to the changing society of mankind, to the wants of a more truthful representation, to the participation by all in the Government that is over all.

Mr. President, I am of those who believe that they will. When I look around on the incongruities and corruptions that surround our present system, when I see what politics and government and administration actually are, if I believed there was to be no progress in that direction I should be bereft of all hope and desolate of faith. On the contrary, methinks I can see adown the vista of the future the golden apples hanging on the tree of promise. It seems to me that the light of the morning is already streaming in upon us that shall illuminate further advancements in the science of government.

And why should not even republican government take to itself other modes of administration without infraction of its fundamental liberties? Why should not large reductions transpire in those opportunities that invite the most sinister combination for offices and spoils? Is there any reason why the emoluments of place should more than repay the labor it calls for? Is there any reason why large abolitions of executive patronage may not transpire; why Government may not generate through examining commissioners, best agencies of its own for the functional work it is called to perform, leaving appeals to the community to pass rather upon controlling measures and general policies and legislative functionaries?

Is there any reason why that should not take place? Sir, already, if I mistake not, in the large cities of this land, which are the local points of your domestic political system, the necessity for such a change is being felt and acted upon, and large branches of executive work and supervision are being necessarily put in commission.

Mr. President, I think what I have said sufficiently shows that the argument which is advanced, that the present surroundings are such that woman could not properly participate in your elections, is an argument that does not go to the right of the woman, but does go to the wrong of the man. It is a criticism, perhaps a satire upon the civilization of your political system, not a justification for any exclusions practiced under it.

There is one other line of remark that has been indulged in, and only one other so far as I have heard, which calls for any special rejoinder, and that affirms the precedents of the past to be all against any such proposition as that now submitted. It is said that there is no precedent, that is not customary in any of our Governments, that it is not one of the recognitions of our society, that it has never been signified as such in the past. I do not know that such an argument amounts to anything at best, but I do know that the allegation itself has no foundation in fact. I know that in many cases and on many occasions this impassable barrier that is now set forth as dividing the natural rights of man and woman has been broken down and trampled upon, and that, too, without any injury to the society from so doing. Perhaps I can best illustrate this point by what an accomplished lady, who has given much thought and research to the subject, has presented. I read from a contribution she has made to one of our leading public prints. She says:

"So long as political power was of an absolute and hereditary character women shared it whenever they happened, by birth, to hold the position to which it was attached. In Hungary, in some of the German States, and in the French Provinces to this day, certain women, holding an inherited right, confer the franchise upon their husbands, and in widowhood empower some relative or accredited agent to be the legislative protector of their property. In 1858, the authorities of the old university town of Upsal granted the right of suffrage to fifty women owning real estate, and to thirty-one doing business on their own account. The representative that their votes elected was to sit in the House of Burgesses. In Scotland, it is less than a century since, for election purposes, parties were unblushingly married in cases where women conveyed a political franchise, and parted after the election. In Ireland, the court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, restored to women, in January, 1864, the old right of voting for town commissioners. The Justice, Fitzgerald, desired to state that ladies were also entitled to sit as town commissioners, as well as to vote for them, and the chief justice took pains to make it clear that there was nothing in the act of voting repugnant to their habits. In November, 1864, the Government of Moravia decided that all women who were tax-payers had the right to vote. In the Government of Pitsa's Island, women over sixteen have voted ever since its settlement. In Canada, in 1850, a distinct electoral privilege was conferred on women, in the hope that thereby the Protestant might balance the Roman Catholic power in the school system. I lived where I saw this right exercised by female property holders for four years. I never heard the most cultivated man, not even that noble gentleman, the late Lord Elgin, object to its results. In New Jersey, the constitution adopted in 1776 gave the right of suffrage to all inhabitants, of either sex, who possessed fifty dollars in proclamation money. In 1790, to make it clearer, the Assembly inserted the words, 'he or she.' Women voted there till 1838, when the votes of some colored women having decided an election the prejudice against the negro came to the aid of lordly supremacy, and an act was passed limiting the right of suffrage to 'free white male citizens.' In 1852 the Kentucky Legislature conferred the right on widows with children in matters relating to the school system. The same right was conferred in Michigan; and full suffrage was given to women in the State constitution submitted to Kansas in 1860."

I think that is a list of illustrations sufficient to dispose of any argument that may arise on such a score.

And now, Mr. President, permit me to say in concluding the remarks I have felt called upon to make here, that I have spoken rather as indicating my assent to the principle than as expecting any present practical results from the motion in question. In the earliest part of my political life, when first called upon to represent a constituency in the General Assembly of Missouri, in looking around after my arrival at the seat of Government at those matters that seemed to me of most importance in legislation, I was struck with two great classes of injustices, two great departments in which it seemed to me the laws and the constitutions of my State had done signal wrong. Those were, one as respects the rights of colored persons; the other as respects the rights of married women, minors, and females; and I there and then determined that whenever and wherever it should be in my power to aid in relieving them of those inequalities and those injustices I would do so to the extent of my humble ability. Since then I have labored zealously in those two reforms as far and as fast as a public opinion could be created or elicited to enforce them, and I can say from my own observation that each step of advance taken has been fruitful of all good and productive of no evil.

Emancipation of the colored race in Missouri has been achieved in a most thorough manner, substantially achieved even before the war; and to-day the community is ripe for the declaration that all are created equal, and that there is no reason to exclude from any right, civil or political, on the ground of race or color. I feel proud to say likewise that Missouri has gone further, and wiped from her statute-book large portions of that unjust and unfair and illiberal legislation which had been leveled at the rights and the property of the women of the State. Believing that that cause which embraces and embodies the cause of civil liberty will go forward still triumphing and to triumph, I will never, so help me God, cast any vote that may be construed as throwing myself in the face of that progress. Even though I recognize, therefore, the impolicy of coupling these two measures in this manner and at this time, I shall yet record my vote in the affirmative as an earnest indication of my belief in the principle and my faith in the future.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I expressed my opinions in relation to the pending measure at considerable length during the last session of Congress. It is my purpose now to repeat my protest against the passage of the bill, but in fewer words than I then used. I know it is destined, as far as human intellect and human will can destine anything, that this measure is to pass and to become a law: I do not at all agree with the position that has been arrogantly assumed by the Radicals on this floor, and that has been acceded to by some of the Conservatives, that the public judgment of this nation has been expressed in favor of negro suffrage. And if it had been by any amount of majority, entertaining the deep convictions that I do of the injustice and evil tendencies of the measure, I would not hesitate a moment to make my earnest and most inflexible opposition to it.

Preliminary to my remarks in immediate connection with the pending bill, I will state some political propositions which a few years since were received in this country generally as axioms in the science of government and statesmanship. No statesman or sound and sensible legislator will support any measure or principle when in the majority that he would not if in the minority. The legitimate end of a limited and constitutional Government is more for the security of the minority than the majority, because of the greater weakness of the minority. The leading feature of government on the North American continent has always been the representative principle. But suffrage has never been universal or even commensurate with manhood. The right to exercise it has not only been limited to men, but it has ever been restricted to particular classes; and the States have jealously reserved to themselves, respectively, all power over this whole subject.

Another general American principle is that every people have the right to govern themselves. This invaluable right, in its fullest amplitude, belonged to each State before its adoption of the Constitution, and so far as it was not delegated by the language of that fundamental and supreme law to the General Government, the States, both by necessary implication and express language, withheld all political sovereignty and powers from the United States, and retained the entire mass to themselves respectively and separately.

To this last great principle the Constitution makes a single exceptional case by this language:

"The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings."

What was the reason that brought the men who formed our Government to establish this exceptional case to the cardinal American principle of self-government? Every previous seat of the United States Government had been under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State in which it was situated, and Congress could exercise no power of legislation or police over it. A mob had more than once disturbed and menaced Congress to coerce and control its action, and it had no power of self-protection; and it was to secure the men who might be in the administration of the Government, at its seat, the personnel of the Government, against such assaults, that this provision of the Constitution was made a part of it. The intention was not that Congress should wholly absorb and inexorably exclude the people of the District from all the powers of self-government. It was contemplated that Congress would be composed of just and enlightened men who would know that the people of the District, by their own chosen representatives, would be much more competent to attend to their own domestic affairs and interests than a Congress coming from every State and charged with the various and vast concerns of the nation could possibly be; and it was reasonably concluded that Congress would at all times concede to this people every power of self-government but such as might be necessary and proper for the protection of the Government and the persons engaged in its administration at its seat.

It was difficult, if not impossible, for a just and wise partition of powers between Congress and the people of this District to be made in the Constitution, because the amount that Congress could wisely and justly exercise would depend upon varying conditions and exigencies, and could not therefore be ascertained and fixed. Congress has always somewhat approximated the principle which I have laid down for the government of this District, but has never, as it should have done, acted singly upon it. Limited local legislative powers and local popular elections to choose the legislators have always been awarded to this District from shortly after the time it became the seat of the Government of the United States, by Congress; and also, the cognate right that the people of the District should for themselves decide what classes and portions of themselves should have suffrage and what should be their qualifications. There had always been a conjunction of these two rights in the people of the United States. This was a great feature, not only of State sovereignty, but of popular liberty, and it was in deference to this universal American idea that Congress surrendered to the people of this District the conjoint exercise of these two rights. In the long possession of this restricted right of government which had been allowed by Congress to this people, they tacitly adopted and have quietly but firmly adhered to another American idea which may be said to have been until recently universal in the United States: that all political sovereignty and powers belong to the white man and are to be exercised by him exclusively.

But a systematic assault is being made upon these fundamental principles of American autonomy and liberty, and the bill under consideration is one of the attacks. It unjustly and mischievously violates all the principles which I have stated. More, it proposes, by conferring suffrage upon the negro population, to introduce into the government of this District a novel, incompetent, and noxious element of power. In a representative Government suffrage is the primary power, and when enlightened, free, independent, and virtuous it dominates, as it should, the Government. The abstract proposition, that no incompetent person should be invested with the right of suffrage, cannot reasonably be denied. If it were practicable to establish a definite and unerring test of competency, the general good would require that all who do not come up to that measure should be excluded.

Such a standard can never be obtained. The population of the United States and of each State consists of well-defined classes, and if the great mass of any of those classes are es-mentally and palpably incapable of self-government, both individually and collectively incompetent, they ought unquestionably to be excluded from suffrage, because they could give no assistance to proper and legitimate government, and if their numbers were relatively large they might aid materially to obstruct, confuse, and pervert it. None will deny that idiots and lunatics are classes of our population that come within the reason of this objection, and that they ought as classes to be excluded from suffrage. There might be many cases of partial lunacy, where the subject would be more capable of a rational and proper exercise of suffrage than many men of more limited but sounder minds; the inconvenience, difficulty, and impossibility of ascertaining in each individual case, the extent of mental infirmity that would make it proper for the particular subject to be excluded, requires the exclusion of the whole class.

But our entire population, like that of all other countries, is divided into two great classes, the male and the female. By the census of 1860 the white female population of the United States exceeded thirteen millions, and the aggregate negro population, of both sexes, was below four and a half millions. That great white population, and all its female predecessors, have never had the right of suffrage, or, to use that cant phrase of the day, have never been enfranchised; and such has also been the condition of the negro population. That about one negro in ten thousand in four or five States have been allowed to vote, is too insignificant to be dignified with any consideration as an exception. But now a frenzied party is clamoring to have suffrage given to the negro, while they not only raise no voice for female suffrage, but frown upon and repel every movement and utterance in its favor. Who of the advocates of negro suffrage, in Congress or out of it, dare to stand forth and proclaim to the manhood of America, that the free negroes are fitter and more competent to exercise transcendent political power, the right of suffrage, than their mothers, their wives, their sisters, and their daughters?

The great God who created all the races and in every race gave to man woman, never intended that woman should take part in national government among any people, or that the negro, the lowest, should ever have co-ordinate and equal power with the highest, the white race, in any government, national or domestic. To woman in every race He gave correlative, and as high, as necessary, and as essential, but different faculties and attributes, intellectual and moral, as He gave to man in the same race; and to both those adapted to the equally important but different parts which they were to play in the dramatic destinies of their people. The instincts, the teachings of the distinct and differing but harmonious organism of each, led man and woman in every race and people and nation and tribe, savage and civilized, in all countries and ages of the world, to choose their natural, appropriate, and peculiar field of labor and effort. Man assumed the direction of government and war, woman of the domestic and family affairs and the care and training of the child; and each have always acquiesced in this partition and choice. It has been so from the beginning, throughout the whole history of man, and it will continue to be so to the end, because it is in conformity to nature and its laws, and is sustained and confirmed by the experience and reason of six thousand years.

I therefore, Mr. President, am decidedly and earnestly opposed to the amendment moved by my friend from Pennsylvania. There is no man more deeply impressed with or who more highly appreciates the important offices which woman exercises over the destiny of the race than I do.

I concede that woman, by her teachings and influence, is the source of the large mass of the morality and virtue of man and of the world. The benignant and humanizing and important influence which she exercises upon the whole race of man in the proper discharge of her functions and duties cannot be overestimated; but that woman should properly perform these great duties, this inappreciably valuable task, it is necessary that she should be kept pure. The domestic altar is a sacred fane where woman is the high and officiating priestess. This priestess should be virtuous, she should be intelligent, she should be competent to the performance of all her high duties. To keep her in that condition of purity, it is necessary that she should be separated from the exercise of suffrage and from all those stern and contaminating and demoralizing duties that devolves upon the harder sex, man.

What is the proposition now before the Senate? To make pure, cultivated, noble woman a partisan, a political hack, to lead her among the rabble that surround and control by blackguardism and brute force so many of the hustings of the United States. Mr. President, if one greater evil or curse could befall the American people than any other, in my judgment it would be to confer upon the women of America the right of suffrage. It would be a great step in the line of mischief and evil, and it would lead to other and equally fatal steps in the same direction. Sir, if ever in the depths and silence of night I send up my secret orisons to my Maker, one of the most fervent of my prayers would be that the women of my country should be saved and sheltered by man from this great contamination. It is not necessary to the proper influence and to the legitimate power of woman. A cultivated, enlightened, delicate, refined, and virtuous woman at the family altar is the persuasive and at the same time plastic power that sways and fashions the principles and character of her children, and thus makes her impress upon the future men of America, the Phocians, the Timoleons, the Washingtons, who are the honor of the race, and whose destiny it is to elevate and ennoble it.

Mr. President, in proportion as man becomes civilized so increases the power and the influence of woman. In the tribes and nations of the lowest ignorance and barbarism this influence is least—it is most potent where there is the greatest intellectual and moral cultivation of man. I want this gentle and holy influence to continue pure and uncontaminated by keeping it within the domestic fane and afar from party politics.

But, sir, it has become the fashion, the philosophy, the frenzy of the day to coin catch-words that carry a seemingly attractive principle, but at the same time alluring and mischievous, and among them is this cry for woman's rights and also for negro suffrage and manhood suffrage and universal suffrage. It is all nothing but slang and demagoguery, and is fraught with aught but evil, mischief, and degradation, individually and nationally.

For these reasons, sir, one of the last propositions, or, if gentlemen choose, principles, which have been or may be propounded to the people of America, or as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to which I shall ever give my acceptance, is female suffrage.

But, Mr. President, the proposition that a nation of a superior race should allow an inferior race resident in large numbers among them to take part in their Government, in shaping, and controlling their destinies, is refuted by its mere statement. And the further proposition that a nation composed of the Caucasian race, the highest type of man, having resident in it more than four million negroes, the lowest type, of which race no nation or tribe, from the first dawning of history to the present day, has ever established a polity that could be denominated a Government, or has elaborated for itself any science or literature or arts or even an alphabet, or characters to represent numbers, or been capable of preserving those achievements of intellect when it has received them from a superior race; such a proposition is, on examination, revolting to reason, and in its practical operation would be productive of incalculable mischief.

The hardness of fanaticism or a selfish hypocrisy has occasionally, in former times as well as now, boldly assumed that the negro is naturally in all respects the equal of the white race; but this not only without any, but in defiance of all, evidence.

The race of people referred to by the term "negro" is well understood, not only by men of science and travelers, but all persons of general reading on the types of mankind. That term comprehends a black skin, but not as an exclusive distinction; also, and especially woolly hair, a peculiar formation of the cranium, face, pelvis, shins, and feet, which are so distinctly enumerated by ethnologists and naturalists, and which they all agree are the natural marks of an inferior race. The first recorded history of the negro found him in Africa and occupying more than one half of that large continent, and mostly within the torrid zone. The whole population of Africa approximates one hundred millions, of which about sixty are of the negro race.

Four thousand years ago, and for all the intervening ages, he was and has been the same unchanging specimen of man in his physical, intellectual, and moral features and properties; the same destitution of arts, architecture, letters, and civil polity; the same absence of all civilization, and the same engulfment in the deepest ignorance and savagism, the tribes and nations making interminable and most cruel wars and either selling into slavery or putting to death all their captives. The negro was placed by Providence to himself, a naked and ignorant savage, upon an uncultivated but great theater. In those respects he was on an equality with the white and yellow races of man; but in organization, in the mental faculties, in all the capabilities and forces to begin and progress with the civilization which illustrate the history of those other two races, and to which no limits can be assigned, the negro was left unendowed by the God of all creation.

This is not the crime, not the misfortune of the negro; it is the inexplicable will of the Omnipotent and incomprehensible Architect of the universe. The negro was made lower and weaker than the other races; he is subordinate to them, and has often been their slave, but never their master; all the occasional, meager, and restricted civilization which he has ever possessed was imparted to him by them, and he could retain it only by their continued contact and help; and but for their superior faculties and endowments the whole world of mankind would now be in primeval and hopeless ignorance and barbarism.

The negro in his original and native home was known to and visited by the commercial people both of the earliest antiquity and of modern times. Three centuries and a half since he was first brought to the American continent a slave, and that trade was continued to the United States from their early settlement up to within the last fifty years. The aggregate cargoes of slaves from Africa to all America amounted to many millions; and to the United States the number has been estimated to be about three hundred and fifty thousand.

All that has ever been written or said of the African negro in his native home have represented him as steeped in ignorance and barbarism, and if ever he made any improvement from one generation to another there is neither record nor memento of it. Every slave that was brought from there to the New World exhibited the same fossilized savage of forty centuries. With each individual from enslavement began melioration, and all the knowledge, civilization, and Christianity which the negroes of America have ever possessed has resulted from their enslavement.

In America the general manumission of African slaves commenced about eighty years since, on the island of St. Domingo. Then followed the same kind of emancipation, by national authority, in the West India Islands of England, France, and other European Powers of which they were the possessions, and lastly in the United States. In these countries emancipation by every owner of slaves had been permitted by their laws; and in some of them large numbers had received their freedom under that system. In St. Domingo the negro has been independent and free to exercise the right of self-government for near a century.

In the British West India Islands he has been freed and invested with the right of local government for a generation, subject to the careful and liberal guardianship of the imperial Government. In those islands the experiment of self-government by the negro has been a deplorable failure; and in St. Domingo it has been the more disastrous because the negro there acted for himself, independent of and unaided by the white man. His deterioration from the time he was a slave, in all of them, is palpable; but in St. Domingo it has been much the greater because the conserving influence of the white man was not there to check and reform it.

Mr. President, when I was a young man and untaught by the hard lessons of experience, I was a devoted believer in the proposition of the civilization of the negro race, and I aided colonization societies to transfer the free negro from the United States to his own native home in the hope that there, with the temporary aid and support of the white man, he would be enabled to build up governments and nationalities and to move forward in the achievements of the highest civilization. But from all that I have since learned of the negro and have read of the efforts to found the English colony at Sierra Leone and the American colony at Monrovia and the adjacent country, and from all the information afforded by the friends of those colonies, I am satisfied in my own mind that negro civilization can never exist in any other condition or connection than his enslavement to the white man. I am satisfied that if the West India colonies of England, of Spain, of France, where emancipation has become consummate, and the colony of Monrovia and the British colony at Sierra Leone were abandoned by the white man, and none of his superior intellect, energy, and conserving influence were continued there, these colonies now somewhat civilized would in a few years fall into as hopeless and as ignorant a barbarism as has hovered over Africa from the beginning of recorded history.

All the experiences of our own country before the late rebellion were confirmatory of the previously established truths, that the negro is the lowest type of man, that he is incapable of organizing any regular Government, that he cannot elaborate civilization or preserve either government or civilization when they are imparted to him by superior races; and the lessons taught by this war, in everything that relates to the negro, adds to the great volume of evidence in support of those propositions which has been accumulating for so many long centuries.

In favor of the proposition of the inequality of the races I have heretofore, adverted to the writings of a great number of men of learning and science, not only theoretically but practically, by residence with and among the negro, and of all that large list there is, according to my information, but a single author of any respectability who maintains the equality of the negro race, and that is Prichard. He assumed that theory when a college boy seventeen years of age, in writing a thesis, and that error imbibed by him in his youth he devoted the labors of a long life and a great intellect to sustain. But the weakness and fallacy of his theory and of his arguments, and of his application of facts to sustain it, were seen and refuted by every mind except his own.

I am one, Mr. President, who believes that our Government is a white man's Government; that it was made by him for himself without the aid or any reference to the negro or the Indian or any other race of man. The Declaration of Independence was made by Congress the 4th of July, 1776; the Confederation of the States had then been in existence for two years. All the States, as colonies, had held African negroes as slaves and property for a longer period than the United States have had a national existence, for more than one hundred years.

The absolute sovereignty of each State was in several of its provisions recognized by the Articles of Confederation; and as distinct and independent sovereignties they made their Declaration of Independence, and also their treaty in 1783 with Great Britain, by which it was acknowledged. This declaration was merely an abstract statement of principles and sentiments, and had no force or obligation of law whatever. It liberated no slave, negro, or Indian, for there were then both. It gave no right of suffrage or any other right to any negro or Indian, free or slave, and it left them precisely as though it had never been made. I will be obliged to any negrophylite to refute these positions.

I do not deny that our national family properly and wisely comprehends all of the nationalities of Europe who may come here, according to the terms of our naturalization laws, and their posterity; but I assert that negroes, Indians, Mongolians, Chinese, and Tartars ought not and cannot safely be admitted to the powers and privileges of citizenship.

There is always and of necessity more or less of hostility and conflict between different races of men living together. This is produced by mutual aversion, and that aversion by dissimilitude. The greater and more fixed their differences, and the nearer the equality of their numbers, the more intense and enduring is their aversion. Color, hair, features, and form are the most palpable and striking differences of race, and between the white and the negro races those differences are greatest, and consequently so are their aversions.

The only possible mode of wholly obliterating the aversions between those races in the United States is their complete and perfect amalgamation, which, between the portion of those two races resident in our country within and north of the temperate zone, is utterly impossible. In that vast region miscegenation between them will never take place. The helots of Sparta and their masters, the Thracian and other white slaves of ancient Greece and Rome, the Saxons of England after the Conquest, and the serfs of Russia, could all be manumitted from slavery and be raised readily to an equality of rights and condition with their conquerors and owners, and become amalgamated with them in one nationality, and harmoniously move on under the same Government to fulfill a united and common destiny, because they were all of the Shemitic race, of the same color, and essentially of the like physical, mental, and moral organization. But between the white and negro races of the United States there can be no such amalgamation, and miscegenation among them cannot take place to any great extent without a commensurate national degeneracy, degradation, confusion, and weakness.

These mischievous and humiliating evil consequences have been produced by the intermixture of the white with the negro and Indian races in Mexico and all the South American countries, and the magnitude of those consequences has been in proportion to the extent of that intermixture in each country.

The permanent separation of the white and negro races in the United States is fixed by the order of their creation, and by the continuous and perpetual operation of immutable laws of nature; and it would be humility, wisdom, and reverence to Deity for man quietly to submit himself to that order and those laws. All his puny efforts to repeal or break down those laws will but show his own littleness and extend, aggravate, and intensify the war between these races. The subordination of the black to the white and the aversion and conflict between them will end only with the destruction or removal of one of them. While they are in juxtaposition it will continue, and the efforts of ambition, frenzy, folly, and hypocrisy to establish equality between them, by dragging down the white or forcing up the negro race, will give it terrible aggravation.

Both the Indian and Mongolian races are essentially superior to the negro race, but neither can they be properly or safely admitted to citizenship; my judgment is to exclude them all, to keep and perpetuate ours as a purely white man's Government. The Indian is a doomed race, and is so rapidly wasting away that he will soon "cease from troubling." The increase of the negro will be wholly from procreation, and hereafter slow; but yet from his present numbers, and being mostly crowded in a few States, is a great disturbing cause of our political and social system. If he were diffused in all the States in proportion to their white population he would no longer disturb, and there would be no effort to confer upon him suffrage. But who can foresee and number the immigration of the Mongolian race to the western shore of our continent? But whatever their numbers now or in the future, whether units or millions, I would give them civil rights, but no citizenship, no political power.

I have no doubt that my honorable friend from Pennsylvania desires that the right of suffrage should be given to women; and if he had the power to transfer all the women of the conservative States into and to become residents of the radical States, who doubts that if that were done the Radicals of this House and of the nation would shout in favor of giving to women the right of suffrage? If the Radicals in Congress and out of Congress knew with the certainty of truth that every vote which they will enfranchise by conferring the right of suffrage on the negro would be cast against that party, in favor of their late southern masters, in favor of the Democracy, in hostility to the schemes of ambition and spoils which are now animating the heart and mind of the great radical organization, who doubts that this party and every mother's son of them would declare for withholding suffrage from the negro?

If these noisy philanthropists who shame or affect to shame all the justice and mercy and philanthropy of the past, would just go home and pass proper State laws and measures to induce this wronged, down-trodden negro race that are residents in the late slave States to immigrate to their borders, there to receive the sympathy, love and protection and community of rights which they are preaching, they would give better evidences of the sincerity of their professions. But, sir, not one of them is moving in that direction. There is not a thought, there is not an emotion of heart among the Radicals North tending in that direction.

Who believes in the vaunted radical position of the equality of races, that the negro must be the equal of the white man before the law, that he must have every legal right, every political and social privilege, everything to elevate his condition and destiny to that of the white man, politically, civilly, and socially? Let the Radical who glories and boasts in the name, and who occupies that position in truth and in honest faith, stand forth and show himself to an incredulous world that would be amazed by such a revelation.

Since the close of the last session of Congress some of the Radicals in each House have changed their relations; they have taken to themselves wives; but which one of them has selected a sable daughter of Africa to occupy that relation? Who of them and of their families now associate with the black as they do with the white race? Where, Senators, are your negro sons-in-law, daughters-in-law, negro brothers-in-law? Where are your connections in all the tender relations of the domestic and family circle of the negro race? The races are either equal or unequal. If they are unequal, they are so according to the laws and marks with which nature has stamped them. If they are equal, they not only have the right to vote, but they have the right to be eligible to all offices; they not only have the right to civil protection and to enjoy all civil rights, but they are entitled also to all political and all social rights. Sir, that is a state of society more dreamy and at the same time terribly revolting than any Utopia that ever entered into the mind of Moore. It does not exist in fact; it does not exist in principle; it does not exist in honest theory; it exists only in party politics; it exists only for the purposes of a party who are in the minority organizing a great force of allies to come to their rescue from overthrow.

Why, then, will the party in power persist in forcing upon the unwilling and defenseless white people of this District negro suffrage, when they have almost unanimously voted to reject it? Such a measure is not at all necessary to protect the United States Government, or those who fill its offices at the capital. This is one of the occasions and questions to which the principle of the right of self-government ought to apply; and a just and magnanimous Congress would accord that right to a people placed wholly within their power by the Constitution, not to be oppressed but to be protected and defended.

But to confer upon two or three thousand male negroes in this District the right to vote at its local elections, is not the object that has awakened so much vehement passion and given so much of energy in favor of this particular measure. It has been declared in this debate, and it was palpable before, that it was but the precursor of a movement to force negro suffrage upon all the States lately in rebellion, and that this bill must be fashioned into a model for them. And why is negro suffrage to be forced upon the ten southern States? To counterpoise them there are twenty-six other States, two radical Territories, Nebraska and Colorado, to be admitted as States in a few days, and three or four Territories of the same political stripe, to be erected into radical States to order upon short notice.

By the census of 1860 the ten proscribed southern States had 7,983,532 population, and the other States had 23,461,457. These ten States have the right to twenty Senators, fifty Representatives, and seventy presidential electors; the other twenty-six States have fifty-two Senators, one hundred and ninety-two Representatives, and two hundred and forty-four electors.

All the States have but recently come out of a great civil war in which the South was terribly used up. There cannot be even a pretext that negro suffrage and the other harsh measures against the South, both in existence and in contemplation, are required to protect the other States or the United States and their Government against its power in the Government or against the hostile military array of its few and subjugated people. It was said yesterday by an honorable Senator upon this floor that God alone can search the hearts of men. If that inscrutable and infallible search could now be made, and its results demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Senate and the American people, I would be willing to venture my life upon the truth of the proposition that in all the essential elements of loyalty, in devotion to the Constitution, to law, and to order, in love for that system of government and liberty which our fathers founded and fashioned and which they have handed down to us as the richest legacy that was ever bequeathed by sires to sons, the South is greatly more loyal than the radical States, the radical portion of the radical States.

What are the incentives to the enormous, continuing, and increasing wrongs and outrages of the northern Radicals against the people of the South? For the two centuries that the northern merchants and shippers tore the savage African negro from his native home and sold him to the southern planter, the great profits of the traffic purchased for the South the friendship of the North. But after a majority of the States had overcome the support with which New England so long and so constantly sustained the slave trade and suppressed it to the United States, by laws declaring it to be and punishing it as piracy, and by a vigilant police of the seas, northern thrift and enterprise set up manufactures and northern tact and talent sought to enrich her manufacturers by high protective tariffs.

The South, almost in solido, resisted the policy to make her and other parts of the country tributary to build up and enrich the northern lords of the spinning jenny and the loom. This resistance of the South continued, and brought down upon her the active and envenomed enmity of the North. She commenced and her whole people soon united in assaulting the great property interest of the South in slavery, which the northern traffickers had, with the countenance and support of that whole people, been so instrumental in building up. Northern passion, hate against slavery, and especially slaveholders, was engendered and heated to the greatest intensity in every form of laboratory which inventive genius could devise. It has been diligently gathering force through all the years of a generation; it has at length found its opportunity, and demon-like it demands to be sated upon the prostrate South. From this wild, multifarious, and infernal cry, high above all others rings out most malignant of all, tones from a class clad in the livery of Heaven, but whose hearts are seething with the spirit of the very hell.

But, Mr. President, in forming and fixing this purpose to hold in subjugation the South, other forces have been and are still actively at work. The love of distinction, office, and power, ambition and avarice; partizanship and the pride of success, the glory of triumph and the humiliation of defeat; the hardy, enterprising, and firm spirit created by reckless and criminal but successful aggression, all these cohesive and propelling forces are operating upon, sustaining, and urging forward the Radicals in their audacious career. They are thus made most formidable enemies, not only to the reunion of the States, but to the continuance of constitutional government and popular liberty; their purpose being to hold on to office and power though they may perish. Yea, their leaders are ready to bring them all forth and offer them upon the unhalloved; the foul altar of faction as the price of their continuing success.

Though the Radicals hold all the political power of the United States, have excluded ten States from the Union and the Government, have broken down for the time the constitutional authority of the executive department, have established practically a congressional despotism, and are devising measures to subvert the legitimate governments of those ten States and substitute for them other governments to be fashioned by this Congress to make them their dependencies and to secure the control of all their political power, yet these Radicals, thus governing and tyrannizing, are in a minority of a half million of the voters of the United States. In many of the northern States their power is trembling in the balance, and very slight causes might at any election make it kick the beam.

They know that the enfranchised white people of the South will be against them as inexorably as fate; hence their desperate efforts to disfranchise that white people and enfranchise the large negro population resident among them. By the civil rights bill, the Freedmen's Bureau, and any other congressional measures needful to the end, their purpose is to take possession of and control the whole of this incompetent negro vote; and in that way wield all the political power of these ten States in Congress, in presidential elections, in the State governments and polity, and thus counterpoise any of the Northern States that may take position against them, and make their tenure of office and power permanent.

This daring and monstrous scheme has at present a fearful number of supporters. It may and will have a temporary success, but it is too utterly subversive of the form and spirit of free and constitutional government, of all State sovereignty and rights, of the tranquillity, prosperity, happiness, and liberties of the whole people, and of all justice and right, and it is too replete with the spirit of injustice, wrong, and despotism to endure. It will be overthrown and crushed out. That is the task laid out for the good, the wise, and the virtuous people of the United States, and it behooves all in their place to mate themselves to their full might in this great work.

The people of the South made war in a wrong cause. They turned their backs upon peace and prosperity and liberty to fight for separate political power, and their heroism was never surpassed. Now, the war is made upon them to deprive them of their right of self-government, of their fields, of their homes, family altars, of their religious temples. They and their wives and their children and their country and everything comprehended by that term; all for which man ought to live, and for the preservation of which he should dare to die, the South is summoned to surrender to the absolute control, by the instrumentality of her own negroes, of her old and inexorable enemies. And she has the great humiliation of having some of her own people to labor to bring upon her this deep and degrading enslavement; yea, worse, she is offered the great insult of being asked to accept it.

Now is coming the terrible time in which the people of the South will be required to exercise their truest heroism. They must resist this great, this most foul, cruel, and dishonoring enslavement, but peacefully and by every peaceful means which they can command. They will stand in need of all their patience, their courage, their fortitude, their power of endurance. To every unjust and degrading demand they must answer with a will fixed as destiny, no! By their peaceful and quiet and heroic suffering they must win even the respect of their enemies and the admiration and sympathies of the world. It will be a dreadful and may be a long trial, but how much more bearable than the shame and galling chains of a voluntary slavery; and such a slavery, to such masters! If it be voluntary, they will well deserve it; if it be involuntary and forced upon them, the justice of God and man will come to their deliverance. Men of the South, exhaust every peaceful means of redress, and when your oppressions become unendurable, and it is demonstrated that there is no other hope, then strike for your liberty, and strike as did your fathers in 1776, and as did the Hollanders and Zealanders, led by William the Silent, to break their chains, forged by the tyrants of Spain.

MR. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, the advocates of the interests of the South are aristocratic; those of the North are democratic; and these ideas represent respectively the education of the two people. One's education has been to sustain class interests, the other the interests of the whole people in opposition to those of a class. The Constitution is brought in to sustain respectively these ideas. Constitutions have heretofore been forced from power, from a class, for the protection and in the interest of the mass of the people, never given by a people willingly to a class for their own subjugation.

I do not believe the history of the world exhibits a spectacle such as is presented to-day, where a power emanating from liberty and from a people imbued with liberal ideas is made an instrument for the protection of that liberty. The immortal Declaration of Independence maintained that all men were created equal, and the present Constitution was established in the interest of that idea, not as some would have us believe in support of the doctrine that a few men are created equal and have rights and privileges by virtue of which they may rule and domineer over the many.

While the populations of the Old World are struggling to emancipate themselves from the power, the rule, and the privileges of a class, in this country, under the lead of a Democratic President, a man who like all around me has come from the people, we find many advocating the interests of a class, and his followers in their desperation are resorting to ridicule, to calumny, and to murder in imitation of his example. How often has the melancholy spectacle been exhibited of men who having been elevated to prominence, to favor, and to power, while advocating liberty and justice in the interests of the great mass of people fighting nobly in their behalf, in opposition to a class, have stultified themselves by advocating doctrines the very opposite of those that had absorbed their lives; and the price thereof is favor, admittance into the charmed circle, bearing upon their breasts marks of distinction, the real badges of their own degradation. How often in the world's history have we witnessed the people wildly sustaining the power of the king, strengthening and cementing that power by their blood and treasure in conquests which have been made the means of their more perfect subjugation.

This, it is true, may be temporary; for as the world progresses and men are imbued with free principles they will not submit; for independent men will not permit a class to be the fountain of honor, emoluments, culture, and education. These, with morality and virtue, belong to all the people; for when otherwise, the inheritance of the people has always been poverty, ignorance, and degradation.

None are now so blind as not to know that in protecting and saving southern institutions, and maintaining southern ideas, the people at the South are kept in poverty, vice, and degradation in order that a class may be elevated to power and prosperity. The northern idea in contradistinction acknowledges and maintains that the fountains of honor, of power, of prosperity emanates from the people. However imperfect may be their administration, the people are in a greater degree prosperous. However ignorant or vicious or poor; however led astray for the moment from their true welfare by the mental and material power of the world in the interest of class, and which is constant and ever on the alert to cheat them into measures for their restrictions and subjugation; I say however all this may be, the end is that the great mass of the people are more intelligent, more independent, more prosperous, and more virtuous under their own rule than under the wisest and best rule of the wisest and best rulers.

I say that the American President is to-day leading a class, and in the interest of a class, in opposition to the privileges and highest welfare of the great mass of the people. He gives us nearly one half of his message in advocacy of the doctrine of his class. Why will he not give us a word in sustaining the true elements of our Government—justice, liberty, equal rights, and protection to life and property among the people? Is our only foundation that of amity, good-fellowship, and friendly feeling between the people of the two sections? Does he not know that these have no permanent existence among the most friendly? Temper, interest, and other causes are constantly breaking in upon this condition; and will he advocate that therefore society is chaos and has no settled permanent formation and existence? Is our Government so weak, is it reduced to this, a Government established upon and which can only be sustained by feeling? Equal rights, equal political privileges, the elevation of the lowest through the elements of religious training and educational culture in contributing to the greatest mutual prosperity of all the people, are these nothing? Do they not give strength to a Government, and will not these give strength to conquer hate, ignorance, and a blind "rule or ruin" policy? Something else besides good-fellowship sustains the principles of a free Government. This is the doctrine of kings and their followers. Oil will mingle freely with water before the ideas advocated in southern interests will mingle with the principles advocated in the interests of free Governments and free peoples. Fire and water will, when united, promote and strengthen the qualities of each before the society of the North, maintained upon its principles, will mingle with the society of the South maintained upon its principles; and just in that proportion will the two systems strengthen equally if the contest is maintained. We may as well come to this conclusion first as last; we shall come to it in the end; the two ideas will not prosper together, never. Which, then, shall prevail? Shall the people rule this country, or shall the king and his followers? In answer, what say the three hundred thousand dead soldiers and the three hundred thousand wounded and maimed men who sacrificed themselves in the cause of liberty, progress, and free government? What say their friends?

Beaten in the contest of arms, another contest, that of the forum, that which desperation only brings forward, is now presented. Ridicule, calumny, and murder are the arguments used here and elsewhere in support of a contest thus transferred. Which then will succeed? God in heaven determines, for if there is a God right will triumph over wrong. If in this Senate some of these elements are used, why may they not in double power be used elsewhere? Because in defense of human rights we have determined to use the colored man for his progress and for the progress of the race, for the education, culture, and prosperity of the white people as well as black, are we determined to use him, and for this we are condemned for making him an instrument therefor. Slavery and the colored man could be made the most powerful element of hostility in the advocacy of class interests; not to promote equal justice, equal political privileges for the people. Who then are the people? Are there not eight million of whites in the South? Have they not rights? Should not justice be meted out to them? Why advocate liberty for one and withhold it from the other? Let the revolution answer. Schooled by the charm of slavery into a hate for liberal institutions, corrupted and bribed into abject submission to the haughty class that had monopolized all power and all emoluments, following blindly these teachings imbibed from their mothers milk, advocates of their own slavery and degradation they engaged in rebellion. Are such safe elements to be introduced into the political and social system of a free people? God forbid.

I speak my own convictions. I am not the exponent of a party nor of one man. These are the honest convictions of my heart, and life, reputation, and property are pledged to sustain them. These are hurried thoughts, thrown together after listening to the debate of the past two days. I know the Senate is impatient for a vote. I know they are determined to vote favorably. When it is necessary that women shall vote for the support of liberty and equality I shall be ready to cast my vote in their favor. The black man's vote is necessary to this at this time.

Mistaken in their plans, the southern leader has amid slavery created a power for his own overthrow. Fearing no evil from his slave, using him to crush all that is manly in labor, all that is virtuous, all that education and culture can bring to any people; using him to crush this out among the great mass of white people at the South, corrupting them, and obtaining their advocacy of their damnable doctrines, they took another step, and would have made the same use of him to make the great mass of white people at the North similar in condition to the great mass of white people at the South. Here they failed. Instead, in the contest of arms, it being an element of strength, it has been weakness.

Who will believe it, and yet no one can controvert it successfully, that the colored masses are far in advance in intelligence, in an aptitude for imbibing all the liberal sentiments of the white masses at the North, than are the white masses of the South? One is dangerous to the great interests of the human race; one is an element of strength to those interests. What then is the duty of legislators? What is the highest interest of the people they represent? To fashion a government for the South which will leave out the destructive tendencies and teachings of the mass of the white population or neutralize them by an introduction of an element of liberty, justice, equality, and in half a generation, though beginning in hate and menace, you will witness peace and concord. That liberty and progress are now jeopardized quite as much, if not more, than when Lee with his murderous engines was in Pennsylvania, I verily believe. I feel a security, however, for the future, because I have confidence in the success of liberal principles over class interests. I do not want to call upon a free people for unnecessary sacrifices for these great principles. By a policy of conciliation in the war, hundreds, thousands of men and billions of money were unnecessarily sacrificed. Let us have confidence in the people. Let us stand firmly upon the platform of Government founded upon the will and wishes of the governed. Let us never consent for one moment that the class who are safe and true to us shall be counted out in the formation of government for the South.

Do not in addition to this prostrate all the industrial interests of the North by a policy of conciliation and of inaction. Delays are dangerous, criminal. When you shall have established firmly and fearlessly governments at the South friendly to the Republic; when you shall have ceased from receiving terms and propositions from the leaders of the rebellion as to their reconstruction; when you shall have promptly acted in the interest of liberty, prosperity will light upon the industries of your people, and panics, commercial and mercantile revolutions, will be placed afar off; and never, sir, until that time shall have arrived. And as an humble advocate of all industrial interests of the free people of the North, white and black, and as an humble representative of these interests, I urge prompt action to-day, to-morrow, and every day until the work has been completed. Let no obstacle stand in the way now, no matter what it may be. You will save your people from poverty and free principles from a more desperate combat than they have yet witnessed. Ridicule may be used in this Chamber, calumny may prevail through the country, and murder may be a common occurrence South to those who stand firmly thus and who advocate such measures. Let it be so, for greater will be the crowning glory of those who are not found wanting in the day of victory. Let us, then, press to the vote; one glorious step taken, then we may take others in the same direction.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say before the votes taken on this amendment that I shall vote in favor of it because of the particular position which it occupies. A vote given for this amendment is not a final one. I understand it to pronounce an opinion upon the two propositions which have been undergoing consideration in the Senate, in a comparative manner, if I may use the expression. In voting for this proposition I affirm simply that the principles and the reasoning upon which the bill itself, as reported by the committee, is based, would apply with equal, if not increased force, to the particular proposition contained in the amendment. If that be affirmed, then recurs the question whether it is proper, whether it is expedient at this time to increase, and very extensively increase, suffrage in this country. I do not understand that the general argument on that question is involved in the present motion. I do not understand that it comes up of necessity in considering the proposition covered by the amendment of my colleague which stands simply in contrast with that contained in the bill. I presume there are several gentlemen, members of this body, who will vote with reference to this consideration and who will reserve their opinion, either openly or in their own consciousness, upon the general or indirect question of the extension of suffrage to the females of the United States.

But the occasion invites some remarks beyond the mere statement of this point. The debates which have been going on for three days in this Chamber will go out to the country.

They will constitute an element in the popular discussions of the times and awaken a large amount of public attention. This is not the last we shall hear of this subject. It will come to us again; and I am persuaded that one reason why it will come again is that the arguments against the proposed extension of suffrage have not been sufficient; they have been inadequate; they have been placed upon grounds which will not endure debate. Those who are in favor of the extension of suffrage to females can answer what has been said in this Chamber, and they can answer it triumphantly; and you will eventually be obliged to take other grounds than those which have been here stated. From the beginning of this debate there has been either an open or an implied concession of the principle upon which the extension of suffrage is asked; and that is, that there is some natural right or propriety in extending it further than it was extended by those who formed our State and Federal Constitutions; that there is some principle of right or of propriety involved which now appeals powerfully to us in favor of extended and liberal action in behalf of those large classes who have been hitherto disfranchised; upon whom the right of suffrage has not been heretofore conferred.

Having made this concession upon the fundamental ground of the inquiry, or at all events intimated it, the opponents of an extended franchise pass on to particular arguments of inconvenience or inexpediency as constituting the grounds of their opposition.

Now, sir, I venture to say that those who resist the extension of suffrage in this country will be unsuccessful in their opposition; they will be overborne, unless they assume grounds of a more commanding character than those which they have here maintained. This subject of the extension of suffrage must be put upon practical grounds and extricated from the sophisms of theoretical reasoning. Gentlemen must get out of the domain of theory. They must come back again to those principles of action upon which our fathers proceeded in framing our constitutional system. They lodged suffrage in this country simply in those whom they thought most worthy and most fit to exercise it. They did not proceed upon those humanitarian theories which have since obtained and which now seem to have taken a considerable hold on the public mind. They were practical men, and acted with reference to the history and experience of mankind. They were not metaphysicians; they were not reformers in the modern sense of the term; they were men who based their political action upon the experience of mankind and upon those practical reflections with reference to men and things in which they had indulged in active life. They placed suffrage then upon the broad common-sense principle that it should be lodged in and exercised by those who could use it most wisely and most safely and most efficiently to serve the great ends for which Government was instituted. They had no other ground than this, and their work shows that they proceeded upon it, and not upon any abstract or transcendental notion of human rights which ignored the existing facts of social life.

Now, sir, the objection which I have to a large extension of suffrage in this country, whether by Federal or State power, is this: that thereby you will corrupt and degrade elections, and probably lead to their complete abrogation hereafter. By pouring into the ballot-boxes of the country a large mass of ignorant votes, and votes subjected to pecuniary or social influence, you will corrupt and degrade your elections and lay the foundation for their ultimate destruction. That is a conviction of mine, and it is upon that ground that I resist both negro suffrage and female suffrage and any other proposed form of suffrage which takes humanity in an unduly broad or enlarged sense as the foundation of an arrangement of political power.

Mr. President, I proposed before the debate concluded, before this subject should be submitted to the Senate for its final decision, to protest against some of the reasoning by which this amendment was resisted. I intended to protest against particular arguments which were submitted; but I was glad this morning that that duty which I had proposed to myself was discharged, and well discharged by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Brown.] For instance, the argument that the right of suffrage ought not to be conferred upon this particular class because they did not or could not bear arms—a consideration totally foreign and irrelevant, in my opinion, to the question which we are discussing.

But, sir, passing this by, I desire to add a few words before I conclude upon another point which was stated or suggested by the Senator from Missouri, and that is the question of reform or improvement in our election system; I mean in the machinery by which or plans upon which those elections proceed. After due reflection given to this subject, my opinion is that our electoral systems in this country are exceedingly defective, that they require thorough revision, that to them the hand of reform must be strongly applied if republican institutions are to be ultimately successful with us.

I would see much less objection to your extension of the right of suffrage very largely to classes now excluded if you had a different mode of voting, if you did take or could take the sense of those added classes in a different manner from that which now obtains in popular voting. You proceed at present upon the principle or rule that a mere majority of the electoral community shall possess the whole mass of political power; and what are the inevitable results? First, that the community is divided into parties, and into parties not very unequal in their aggregate numbers. What next? That the balance of power between parties is held by a very small number of voters; and in practical action what is the fact? That the struggle is constantly for that balance of power, and in order to obtain it all the arts and all the evil influences of elections are called into action. It is this struggle for that balance of power that breeds most of the evils of your system of popular elections. Now, is it not possible to have republican institutions and to eliminate or decrease largely this element of evil? Why, sir, take the State of Pennsylvania, whose voice, perhaps, in this Government is to give direction to its legislation at a given time, and take a pecuniary interest in the country largely interested in your laws, looking forward upon the eve of a hotly-contested election to some particular measures of Government which shall favor it: with what ease can that interest throw into the State a pecuniary contribution competent to turn the voice of that powerful State and change or determine the policy of your Government. And why so? It is only necessary that this corrupt influence should be exerted very slightly indeed within that State from abroad in order to turn the scale, because you are only to exert your pernicious power upon a small number of persons who hold the balance of power between parties therein. Sir, that organization of our system which allows such a state of things to occur must be inherently vicious. Instead of this being a Government of the whole people, which is our fundamental principle, which is our original idea, it is a Government, in the first place, of a majority only of the people; and in the next place, it is in some sort a Government of that small number of persons who give preponderance to one party over another, and who may be influenced by fanaticism, corruption, or passion.

This being our political state at present with reference to electoral action, what do you propose? We have a great evil. Electoral corruption is the great danger in our path. It is the evil in our system against which we must constantly struggle. Every patriot and every honest man here and in his own State is bound to lift his voice and to strike boldly against it in all its forms, and it requires for its repression all the efforts and all the exertion we can put forth. Now what is proposed by the reformers of the present time? We have our majority rule—it is not a principle; it is an abuse of terms to call it a principle—we have our majority rule in full action, presenting an invitation to corrupt, base, and sinister influences to attach themselves to our system; we have great difficulties with which we now struggle arising from imperfect arrangements, and what do you propose? To reform existing evils and abuses? To correct your system? To study it as patriots, as men of reflection and good sense? No, sir. You propose to introduce into our electoral bodies new elements of enormous magnitude. You propose to take the base of society, excluded now, and build upon it, and upon it alone or mainly, because the introduction of the enormous mass of voters proposed by the reformers will wholly change the foundations upon which you build.

Will not these new electors you propose to introduce be more approachable than men who now vote to all corrupt influences? Will they not be more passionate and therefore more easily influenced by the demagogue? Will they not be more easily caught and enraptured by superficial declamation, because more incapable of profound reflection? Will not their weakness render them subservient to the strong and their ignorance to the artful?

I shall not, however, detain you with an elaborate argument upon this question of suffrage. I only feel myself called upon to say enough to indicate the general direction of my reflections upon the questions before us; to show why it is that I am immovably opposed at this time to extending our system of suffrage in the District of Columbia or elsewhere so as to include large classes of persons who are now excluded; and to state my opinion that reform or change should be concerned with the correction of the existing evils of our electoral system, instead of with the enlargement of its boundaries.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; let us have a vote.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, this amendment, in my judgment, opens a very grave question; a question graver than it appears at the blush; a question upon which the ablest minds are divided here and elsewhere; a question, however, upon which we are called upon to vote, and therefore one upon which I desire very briefly to state the views which control my judgment when I say that I shall vote against the amendment which is now offered.

For myself, sir, after giving some considerable reflection to the subject of suffrage, I have arrived at the conclusion that the true base or foundation upon which to rest suffrage in any republican community is upon the family, the head of the family; because in civilized society the family is the unit, not the individual. What is meant by "man" is man in that relation where he is placed according to nature, to reason, and religion. If it were a new question and it were left to me to determine what should be the true qualification of a person to exercise the right of suffrage, I would fix it upon that basis that the head of a family, capable of supporting that family, and who had supported the family, should be permitted to vote, and no other.

While I know that the question is not a new one; while it is impossible for me to treat it as a new question because suffrage everywhere has been extended beyond the heads of families, yet the reason, in my judgment, upon which it has been extended is simply this: if certain men have been permitted to vote who were not the heads of families it was because they were the exceptions to the general rule, and because it was to be presumed that if they were not at the time heads of families they ought to be, and probably would be. I say that according to reason, nature, and religion, the family is the unit of human society. So far as the ballot is concerned, in my judgment it represents this fundamental element of civilized society, the family. It therefore should be cast by the head of the family, and according to reason, nature, and religion man is the head of the family. In that relation, while every man is king, every woman is queen; but upon him devolves the responsibility of controlling the external relations of his family, and those external relations are controlled by the ballot; for that ballot or vote which he exercises goes to choose the legislators who are to make the laws which are to govern society. Within the family man is supreme; he governs by the law of the family, by the law of reason, nature, religion. Therefore it is that I am not in favor of conferring the right of suffrage upon woman.

Now, Mr. President, one word further on the subject of suffrage as it concerns the other races. We are Caucasians and represent that race. From history, from our education, from our experience, every man of full age of the Caucasian race in this country, as a general rule, is competent. The Indians, the Africans, the Mongolians, the Asiatics in this country, from their history, from their position, are incompetent as a general rule, the exceptions only being competent. We may as well speak the truth on this question. When a man tells me that the Indians, for instance, of the States and Territories are competent to exercise this great right of suffrage, he tells me what I certainly cannot be made to believe; what, it seems to me, it is impossible for any man in his senses to believe. When a man tells me that the Africans in this country just set free on the plantations—I now speak of them as a mass; I do not speak of the exceptional cases; there are a great many colored men of intelligence and character and standing who are perfectly competent to exercise the right—but when a man tells me that as a mass these men just set free are competent to exercise the right of suffrage and help to shape the laws of this great Republic, he states what is perfectly abhorrent to my sense of justice, reason, or propriety. Sir, it would be a burlesque on republican institutions, and we should make ourselves the laughing stock of the world by doing any such thing. To say that three or four million slaves, who have just been set free from a bondage of two hundred years in this country, and who in the country from which they came were descended from a race and from a position the most degraded on the face of the earth, are educated, that they are experienced, that they are in condition now, the moment their shackles are stricken off, to exercise this high right of franchise, is contrary to reason, in my judgment.

It seems to me perfectly impossible that they can be competent. There are some exceptions, and if you could frame a law so as to meet the exceptional cases it would be right, here in the District, or, if any State could do it, elsewhere. It is just so with the Asiatics over in California. What kind of a spectacle would it be if the seventy or eighty thousand Chinamen there, who know nothing of our republican institutions, who can know nothing of them at present, were permitted to exercise this right of suffrage? Will it be contended that the Indians of the Territories and the States (with exceptional cases, it is true, which might be provided for by the laws of those States) are competent to exercise the right of franchise? It is impossible that it should be so in the nature of things.

While I do not object to laws here or elsewhere that may provide for the exceptional cases and that would admit to the right of franchise in this District those colored men who are competent; while a law providing for that would meet my approbation, I think that to confer universal manhood suffrage in this District into which freedmen from all the States can flock ad libitum, without restriction, is dangerous. It seems to me that we are wild when we talk of such a thing or imagine that the American people have passed judgment in favor of anything like that. Had you proposed a thing like that before the last election and made that an issue in the canvass you would have found a very different verdict. That issue was avoided everywhere. The idea of universal negro suffrage as the basis of reconstruction was avoided in every State in the Union. Possibly in Massachusetts it was not; I am not so sure about that; but in every State where there was any fear of losing the election this question was not raised; and for our friends to stand up now and say that the judgment of the people has been declared in favor of universal negro suffrage to be imposed upon the South as the basis of reconstruction is all folly. It was not contained in the constitutional amendment, which was made the basis or claimed to be made the basis upon which the election was carried.

Mr. President, I have stated very briefly that I shall not be able to vote for the proposition of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.] I shall not be able to vote for this bill if it be a bill to give universal suffrage to the colored men in this District without any restriction or qualification. I have been informed that some other Senator intends before this bill shall have passed in the Senate to propose an amendment which will attach a qualification, and perhaps, should that meet the views of the Senate, I might give my support to the bill. I shall not detain the Senate further now on this subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to say in just a brief word that I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, simply because I am in favor of this measure and I do not want to weigh it down with anything else. There are other measures that I would be glad to support in their proper place and time; but this is a great measure of itself. Since I have been a member of the Senate, there was a law in this District authorizing the selling of these people. To have traveled in six years from the auction-block to the ballot with these people is an immense stride, and if we can carry this measure alone of itself we should be contented for the present. I am for this measure religiously and earnestly, and I would vote down and vote against everything that I thought weakened or that I thought was opposed to it. It is simply with this view, without expressing any opinion in regard to the merits of the amendment, that I shall vote against it and all other amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] to strike out the word "male" before the word "person," in the second line of the first section of the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia as a substitute for the whole bill, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FOGG. I desire to state that I have received a telegram from my colleague, [Mr. CRAGIN,] who is in New York, stating that he is detained there by the sickness of his wife.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 9, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckwalter, Cowan, Foster, Nesmith, Patterson, Riddle, and Wade—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Fowler, Guthrie, Johnson, McDougall, and Nye—6.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIXON. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of the first section of the amendment reported by the committee:

Provided, That no person who has not heretofore voted in this District shall be permitted to vote unless he shall be able at the time of offering to vote to read and also write his own name.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered provides that no person not heretofore a voter shall be authorized by this bill to vote who is unable to read and also to write his own name. I have offered it not with the intention of obstructing, but in the hope of aiding the passage of the bill. I intend to vote for it if thus amended. I may be permitted to say that I have always, whenever an opportunity has been presented, voted to extend suffrage irrespective of color. I thus voted when the question was raised in the territorial bills of recent sessions. Once, I think, in the Legislature of Connecticut and twice at the polls I have voted to erase the word "white" from the constitution of my own State. My opinions on the subject have not changed. I still believe that color or race should not be the test of the right of voting. I would deny to no man the right of voting solely on account of his color; but I doubt the propriety of permitting any man to vote, whatever his race or color, who has not at least that proof of intelligence which the ability to read and write furnishes. It is true, as the Senator from Massachusetts remarked yesterday, that there are instances in which remarkable intelligence is found in men who can neither read nor write, yet these are exceptional. As a general rule, while ability to read and write does not prove high intelligence, the want of this ability proves gross ignorance and utter incapacity to vote intelligently. It is therefore no injustice to say to any man, white or black, Before you share in the direction of public affairs you must at least furnish this evidence of your capacity. This rule is, therefore, with great justice, applied in the State of Connecticut to white men, and in the State of Massachusetts to all men irrespective of color. The reasons for its application exist much more strongly in this District, where the class of black men who cannot read is large, than in the State of Massachusetts where their votes could not perceptibly affect the decision of any public question. Yet the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to remind him that the "reading test," so called, was inserted in the constitution of that State by the party of which he was a very prominent member, if not with his consent. What is just in Massachusetts cannot be unjust in this District. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As a general proposition I am not in favor of basing the right to vote upon the intelligence of the voter; and in regulating the right of voting among white people I should not vote for such a proposition; but as it is now proposed to introduce into the citizenship of this District a large class of persons who are known to be very ill-qualified to exercise the right of franchise, I feel it to be my duty in regard to them to vote for this qualification. I wish to make this explanation before giving my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I tried, Mr. President, to reconcile myself to vote for the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania with a view of benefiting the condition of the people of this District. I believe that upon the passage of this bill this active, never-satisfied abolition element of the country will put itself to work to flood this District with as many free negroes as possible, so as to get control of the District, elect its mayor, its common council, and have at least one free negro government in the American Union; and although I am not in favor of female suffrage for reasons which have been so well stated by others who have spoken on the subject, yet with a view to delay as far as possible such a catastrophe as that I tried to bring my mind to the conclusion to vote for it. But, sir, to vote for it would have been to vote to confer the right of suffrage upon negro women as well as upon white women, and under no circumstances here, in my own State, or wherever upon this continent I may be located, will I vote for negro suffrage under any circumstances. It is but the beginning of forcing negro suffrage everywhere throughout this country. This bill, in the language of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY,] is to be a model to be copied throughout the States, and we have his assurance at least throughout the Northwest it is to be followed.

Neither, sir, can I vote for the proposition of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. What is the test? A person who can read and write. Is it his name, or only read and write? ["His name."] Read and write his name; a wonderful amount of education to qualify a man for the discharge of the high office and trust of voting! Great knowledge of the system of government under which we live does this impart to the voter! But, sir, in voting for that I also vote for negro suffrage to some extent. I have no more prejudice against this race than gentlemen who assume to be their warmest friends. I know them much better than they do. I have received many more acts of kindness from some of them than they have, and I have extended to them many more acts of kindness than they have. If I know my own heart to-day, the early recollections of childhood and the experience of my life would teach me that wherever it was in my power to extend to them an act of kindness to do it.

Born in their midst, with them as my playmates in childhood, with them as members of my own father's household, I have no unkindness for them; and to-day their true friends are not to be found among that class of men—I will not say who are to be found in this Chamber, but who are to be found in this country—who clamor for their equality of rights. But, sir, when their true friends are to be found among those who have known them, who have been taught from early infancy and throughout all their lives to treat them with that kindness with which an inferior race ought to be treated by a superior race.

Sir, it has been stated during this debate—and if it had not been for the introduction of this amendment perhaps I should not have said a word even upon the final passage of the bill—that the adoption of this measure was a duty the Congress of the United States owed the nation, and it was to be done for the benefit and for the example of the nation.

Sir, I thought that the object governing the framers of the Constitution in giving exclusive legislative power over the District to the Congress of the United States was not to legislate for the people of the whole United States, but to legislate for the people of the District of Columbia. It gave this exclusive jurisdiction over the ten miles square because the capital being located here and the public property being located here, it was necessary and proper that Congress should have the control of the District so as to preserve and protect the capital of the country; but so far as legislation to govern the people was concerned it was designed to relate simply and solely to the people of the District of Columbia. It was not for purpose of setting up a model government to be imitated by States, no more than it was to set up a model government to be imitated by all the nations of the earth.

And now, sir, I appeal to the honest heart of every Senator here, if it be true, as I suppose it is true, that the Congress of the United States sustains the same relation to the people of this District as the Legislature of a State does to the people of a State, and if in the States from which you come, Senators, there was such a large proportion of the whole people opposed to conferring the right of suffrage upon the negroes in your midst, would you, in defiance of that strong popular sentiment and will, confer the suffrage upon the negroes in your own State? I ask the Senators from Maine, I ask the Senators from Kansas, and other Senators who have spoken on this subject in advocacy of this bill, if this question were to be submitted to your own people, whether the suffrage should be conferred upon the negro race in your midst and there was such a majority of the white people of your State opposed to it as there is in the District of Columbia opposed to it; that is, if the opposition to it was as great in proportion to the numbers in your States as it is here, would you vote for it?

Gentlemen, you would not unless you intended to make political martyrs of yourselves. Now, you being the Legislature of the District of Columbia, and the people of this city having by a vote of between six and seven thousand against thirty-five asked you not to pass this act, and the other portions of the District being unanimously opposed, will you do it? You would not do it if you were legislating for the people of your own States. You are now acting as the Legislature of the District of Columbia. Then you are not governed in your action by a desire to conform to the will of the people for whom you act, but by a desire to show here an example of free negro government so that that example may be imitated in other sections of the country, and you hope that from this center will go forth such an influence as to cause the people in the different States of the Union to follow your example.

Mr. President, be not mistaken. I know it has been said that the people of the southern States will follow this example. It has been said in other quarters that unless they do they shall have no part or lot in the Federal Union, but that they shall be reduced to a territorial condition and shall be no longer States of this Union. Sir, there is nothing that stings a proud and noble spirit so much as dishonor, and I trust in God there is not a son of a southern State who will so debase and degrade himself as to accept of representation in either House of Congress upon such degrading and dishonorable terms. What, sir, gallant, proud, and noble States of the American Union to be asked to follow your example, and to admit to participation in the legislation of their States a numerous class of persons, wholly unfit, wholly incapable of exercising any of the offices, powers, or functions of Government! Never, sir, never. You have no right to impose such conditions and they would degrade themselves, if they accepted them.

But, sir, during the progress of this discussion the merits of this bill have been placed upon higher grounds, or what are supposed to be higher grounds. It has been put on the ground of the equality of the races in the sight of God and of man, and we were told by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] in effect and in substance, that those who denied this doctrine were infidels. Then, sir, all the civilized nations which have ever lived on earth among whom the African race existed were infidels; then, sir, was the writer of the Pentateuch himself an infidel. Now, I charge home, that instead of the doctrine of the inferiority of race being a doctrine of infidelity, the assumption of the equality of races is itself infidelity, because it is a denial of the Scriptures. Although I had no intention of entering upon this train of thought, I will dwell upon it for a moment longer, as I see the honorable Senator now before me, and he was good enough to indicate to us that he was a believer, and that some of us were infidels, in his reference to a passage of Scripture, "cursed is Canaan; servant of servants shall he be." The Senator proclaimed in effect that those who believed that thereby the curse of slavery or servitude was put upon this race were infidels. Let me tell that Senator that if he believes the Bible, even accepting the meaning of the word found in that passage as "servant," he must himself admit the negro's inferiority. If this class of people be in fact, the descendants of Canaan, then he must admit that the Bible itself says servant of servants shall they be. Then they are distinguished from their brethren in that respect. Then there is inferiority of condition.

But I will show to that honorable Senator that the words in which that curse were pronounced prove conclusively that something, if not to be lasting and forever, yet something of great magnitude was contained in that curse. What is the language used? I refer my very learned friend to the original in which it is placed, and if he will refer to the term "servant of servants" he will find it there expressed in the strong words naubad naubadan, which means "slave of slaves," or, according to the idiom of that language, a slave forever, and for his benefit I will tell him that that word corresponds with the word doulos, doulos, in Greek, which means a slave born about your house as a slave. But, sir, I had no intention of alluding to that branch of the honorable Senator's argument, and would not had I not seen him present in the Chamber.

Mr. President what should be the object of Congress in legislating for the people of this District? Should it be to try an experiment, or should it be the practical good of the people living here? Is there any Senator who believes that giving the right of suffrage to this large class of free negroes would cause the affairs of this city to be better administered? Is there any Senator who believes that by conferring upon this class of people the right of voting at the elections in this District, better officers will be thereby selected, that the financial affairs of this corporation will be better managed, the general prosperity of the people of the District be promoted, and their general good and happiness advanced? Is there such a great amount of wisdom to be found in this class of people that it is necessary to call in their aid for the administration of its affairs? If so, the advocates of this bill have made a wonderful discovery, indeed.

But, Mr. President, as all argument upon this subject will be unavailing, as nothing can I suppose prevent the final passage of this bill, and I presume its finally becoming a law, I content myself simply with protesting against it as a Senator upon this floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 12, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORNTRON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The following members, in addition to those heretofore reported, appeared, namely:

Missouri—John Hogan.

New York—Thomas T. Davis and Demas Hubbard.

Pennsylvania—Charles Denison.

WAR DEBTS OF LOYAL STATES.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the committee on the war debts of the loyal States be directed to inquire into the expediency of assigning to each loyal State the right to tax the national banks within its limits at a rate not exceeding two per cent. annually on the capital stock, said tax to be in lieu of all national taxes except one tenth of one per cent. on the average annual circulation for the expenses of the Currency Bureau, and to be accepted by the loyal States as satisfaction in full for all claims against the Government for expenses incurred in raising and organizing troops for the late war, other than those that may be audited and paid under existing law.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I object.

REPORTS OF LAKE SURVEYS.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the annual publication of a separate report of the progress of the survey of the northern and northwestern lakes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolutions:

Whereas by an act of Congress passed at the last session it was provided that the Secretary of the Treasury might withdraw from circulation $4,000,000 of United States notes each month; and whereas the object of such withdrawal was for the purpose of destroying said United States notes, and thus gradually but surely lessening the volume of paper currency in the country, and thus enabling the Government and the banks to return as speedily as consistent with safety to a specie basis: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire and report to this House what amount of United States notes have been so retired and destroyed since the passage of said act, what amount is now being destroyed daily, whether the notes so destroyed are counted by different men in different offices, and what safeguards are in use for the certain destruction of all the United States notes which by law are now authorized to be retired; also, whether there is an accumulation of said notes on hand, whether a complete record is kept of all denominations, showing the amount of each denomination burned each day or week, and if so, whether such record is kept in more than one office, and whether in their opinion any further checks or guards are necessary to insure the certain destruction of all United States notes which by law are now authorized to be withdrawn from circulation.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House a more speedy withdrawal of currency from circulation than was authorized by the act of last session, to wit, $4,000,000 each month, would not add to the general welfare and financial prosperity of the country.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McRUER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to quiet title to land in the town of Santa Clara, in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BERRY AND HIGGINS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I ask that by unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 128) for the relief of Berry & Higgins, and that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I desire then to move that the latter committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The SPEAKER. The effect of that will be that the bill will lie on the table, and no further legislation will be had.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. That is what I desire.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar will be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it will be recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I now move that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas several of the States lately in rebellion have through their Legislatures refused to ratify the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress at their first session: Therefore,

1. Resolved, That said amendments are deemed necessary for the preservation of the Union, and required in order to guaranty to every State a republican form of government.

2. That no State lately in rebellion against the Government of the United States ought to have a representation on this floor as long as such State declines the ratification of said amendments.

3. That said amendments are offering to the late rebellious States terms precedent to the admission of representation more conciliatory than they had a right to expect, and if they continue to refuse to ratify the same conditions more stringent ought to be required.

4. That the doctrine of universal amnesty to those who endeavored in the late bloody conflict to dismember this Republic ought to be discarded by every loyal patriot.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the officers and assistants having in charge the Hall of Representatives and the approaches thereto be directed to open all the doors leading into the Hall and galleries, and all the outside doors in the Representatives' wing of the Capitol, and keep the same open for the space of two hours after every adjournment of the House, and during two hours on the morning of each meeting of the House, at such hours as will allow sufficient time to heat the Hall properly for the use of the House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I object.

NAVIGATION OF RIVER THAMES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation by the United States of such a sum of money as under the estimate of the appropriate department shall be deemed sufficient for enlarging and maintaining the channel of the river Thames, at and below the City of Norwich.

EATON AND GAGE.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Messrs. Eaton & Gage have leave to withdraw their memorial and papers referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, asked leave of absence for Mr. HUMPHREY from last Monday, to continue indefinitely.

Leave was granted.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] desires to be excused from further service upon the select committee on the civil service of the United States. If there be no objection he will be excused.

There was no objection.

TEXAS.

Mr. COOPER presented the credentials of Benjamin H. Epperson, claiming to represent the second congressional district of Texas; which were, under the rule, referred to the select joint committee on reconstruction.

PUNISHMENT OF TREASON.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be House bill No. 634, to repeal certain parts of the act approved April 30, 1790, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary by Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, pending yesterday at the expiration of the morning hour, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, having been somewhat admonished by my conservative friends I have gone far enough I will say nothing further. I understand the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] desires to say something supplemental to what I have said, and as he will say it better than I can I will yield the floor to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] representing the minority of the committee, is claiming the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to fifty-two minutes, having spoken eight minutes yesterday.

Mr. JENCKES. I wish about five minutes. I will yield then to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. Speaker, the statutes of 1790, a portion of which is sought to be repealed by the bill now before the House, created four capital offenses: first, treason, fixing the punishment of treason as the Constitution empowered Congress to do; second, murder; third, piracy; and fourth, forgery. This bill seeks to repeal a limitation to the prosecution of certain of these offenses. In the statute itself I find no limitation in the cases of willful murder and forgery. Forgery has since ceased to be a capital offense in the courts of the United States. The exception of willful murder still remains. The effect of this bill, therefore, will be to extend the time for finding indictments in cases of treason and piracy alone.

I submit that upon every question of justice and public policy this bill ought not to pass. Courts of justice have, in these later times, paid greater respect to statutes of limitation than they have at any former period in the history of the law in England and in this country. They have declared emphatically in cases civil and criminal that they are conducive to the peace and welfare of society and ought not to be disturbed. They have been construed strictly both in civil and criminal actions.

This proposed repeal, if it has any intention, is made only in reference to cases of treason. Piracy is always committed upon the high seas and out of the jurisdiction of any State under a flag not recognized by any civilized nation. Its proper definition confines it to those who commit offenses sailing under the black flag alone. They are not only criminals against the United States or the laws of the United States, but are enemies of human kind, and wherever arrested and found may be punished, not only by the laws of the United States, but by the laws of every civilized nation. I consider, therefore, this repeal does not affect any case of that kind. It is made, then, solely against the time for finding of indictments for treason.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is any offense for punishment or prosecution to which a statute of limitation should be passed it is of that class denominated political offenses, of which treason is the highest. Every person who has committed that offense against the United States during the late rebellion has been for twenty months within the actual power of this Government; part of the time within the military power; now within both the military and civil power. This repeal refers to the time for finding the indictment. If an indictment cannot be found within twenty months, what assurance can the gentleman give that it can be found within twenty years?

If it cannot be found within three years, what reason is there for having it found after three years? If the state of things briefly referred to as being the moving cause of this bill, then the defect is in the machinery by which the law is to be carried into execution. Remedy that, and do not repeal your old statutes. These offenses committed against the majesty of the State are those of all others which are soonest healed by the action of time. There has never been any sedition, any treason, any rebellion in which parties of the same country and nation, arrayed in arms against each other, when at another period they have not been found acting together. It is contrary to the history of nations to suppose that they can be permanently or even long divided on political questions, even though those questions have driven them to arms.

Mr. Speaker, we have examples in history of the error of this kind of legislation. We might go back to the republic of Rome, and find a consul arraigned after forty years for the murder of a leader of sedition. We can go back to English history, and cite cases in addition to those cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yesterday, where persons, long after the commission of the offense, have been tried, convicted, and executed. We may look even to the case in England which in our statute falls in the exception, where a Governor of an island was indicted in London, tried, convicted, condemned, and executed twenty years after the commission of the offense. If we repeal all statutes of limitations and refuse to pass statutes of indemnity, the judge advocate who prosecuted the assassins of President Lincoln, the court that tried them, the President who signed their death-warrant, might be arraigned before an adverse court and jury in this District without limit as to time except the duration of their natural lives, and condemned and executed. Such a state of things is foreign to the spirit of the law, of the age, and of Christianity, and it ought not to be suffered to be reinstated in the laws of this nation. It had but a brief existence, if it had any, from the time of the adoption of the Constitution until the passage of the statute of April, 1790, and never ought to be imported into our laws from the English or any other law.

Nay, Mr. Speaker, we might go further. The last Congress passed acts in the nature of statutes of limitation to prevent the prosecution of loyal men in arms obeying the orders of their superiors. And this Congress has before it bills of a similar character following the examples of these precedents. A Congress of a different mind might repeal all these statutes and subject the innocent servants of the Republic to suits for damages or prosecution for crime at any time, as this bill expresses it, or within any new limit which another Congress might fix to it.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will not pass, that we shall look at this statute of 1790 as learned courts and wise judges have looked at this and other statutes of limitation, as a statute of repose, a statute of peace, and leave the punishment of crimes, the time and manner of their prosecution, to the law as it stood when the offense was committed.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat refreshing to me at least, and no doubt to the other members upon this side of the House, to find that there are gentlemen here who, while they disagree with us politically, have a disposition to have this question which has agitated the country so seriously for five or six years quieted and settled. I think there are serious objections to the passage of a law of this kind, not only upon grounds of policy but of legal import. If the passage of such a law be not strictly and technically within the meaning of the Constitution an ex post facto law, it is certainly a retroactive law. It will be a law against the genius of this Republic, against the spirit of our institutions. It is one that in former times has never been countenanced. Our fathers framed this law directly after the Revolution, when they had been guilty within the technical meaning of the English law of the very same identical offense of which the people this bill is intended to reach were guilty. Although the cause in which our fathers were engaged is considered by the people of this country as one of more import in character and entitled to more respect and consideration—which it undoubtedly was, as it was the noblest act of mankind—yet if the rebellion in which they were engaged had failed they would undoubtedly have been liable to the same rules of conviction according to the laws of England that are now attempted to be inscribed upon the statute-book of this country.

As was well said by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] an offense of this character does not partake of the nature of a crime. It does not partake of the character of assassination, murder, robbery, or theft. It has not that moral turpitude annexed to it that attaches to crimes not of a political character, and which are denominated by the law malum in se; and we know that in all ages of this earth, from the remotest times since Governments have been first known, and especially since the first formation of republics, and they have been known for several hundred years, there have been rebellions, tumults, and commotions of the same kind and character as the one which we are now providing to punish. The wisdom of ages has taught those who have gone before us that a spirit of charity and leniency is better for the advancement of a republic and even of a monarchy, by dealing with men who have only been guilty of political crimes in a charitable manner.

Sir, I feel that the time has come when the people of this country should turn their hearts from the blood and strife of war to the blessing of peace in this land; peace not by recurring to vengeance and passion, but to the instrumentalities by which this Government was first established; instrumentalities which were devised in the spirit of a conscientious belief in the wisdom, fraternal regard, and affection which actuated our fathers in the formation of the law. There ought not to be visited upon the people of the South any vengeance. They have exhibited a most magnanimous spirit. I am astonished at their magnanimity and meekness. I think the time has come when we should legislate as well for the benefit of the South as of the North. From the reason and justice of the case and the general definition of ex post facto, it strikes me that this is an ex post facto law, because the legal meaning of such a law is that you can pass no law after the crime has been committed that places the defendant in more jeopardy than he was in at the time of or directly after the commission of the act. Every one must see that those persons who it is claimed have committed treason will be placed in more jeopardy by the removal of the limitation, because as time goes on the jeopardy increases.

Our fathers knew perfectly well the nature of the offense of treason. They had gone through a mighty rebellion. They had protested against the tyranny and despotism of King George, and they knew the necessity of quieting offenses of a political character as soon as possible consistent with the interests of the nation. Eighteen months having elapsed since peace was proclaimed why should we undertake to legislate against the people of the South in such manner as to induce common informers to seek their blood through the period of a generations life, and to worry and harass a brave and courageous people who are now subdued and pleading for justice and mercy at our feet? Why should we undertake to break up and destroy the commercial relations which ought to exist between the people of the South and the people of the North, and to intimidate the people of the South, and declare them subject to the penalties of treason, although they have received the benefit of the amnesty and pardoning power of the President, and to place them in danger of being under the control of a despotic Congress at any time hereafter, who as now may by the impulse of crazy fanaticism be found clamoring for their blood?

We are told by the gentleman who reported this bill that one of the objects of offering it is to frustrate and destroy the pardoning power which the President in his magnanimity, generosity, goodness of soul, and Christian conduct has seen fit to dispense to the downtrodden and fallen people of the South. I want no such impediment in his way. When he came into power he found ten million people guilty before the law. He did as every other human man would have done—as I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would have done, judging from his remarks of yesterday—he extended his pardoning power over the great mass of the people who had been engaged in the rebellion, and by law that pardon and that amnesty relieve them from all the part they took in the rebellion, and the consequences of their crime, as has been well said by the gentleman who preceded me, [Mr. JENCKES.] Statutes of limitation have been particularly favored in this country, and there is no reason now why this old landmark of the Government, this old principle which was established by our fathers just after the close of the Revolution, should be overridden and subverted by this Congress. I tell you, gentlemen, that the time has come when you should look to the interests of the whole country; when all of us should desire to see all the seats in this Hall filled by Representatives from every State in this Union. The object of the war, as I understood it, was to restore the Union, and I want the principles of justice and liberty laid down in the fundamental lines of the Constitution to be adhered to by this House.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman if he desires the seats in this House to be filled by the traitors whom this bill would reach and punish?

Mr. ROGERS. I desire that there shall no longer be known in this country any traitors for what was done in the war. I want to see the privileges and benefits of our Government extended to the people of the South as well as to the people of the North, and had I been President of the United States I would have issued a general proclamation of amnesty before this Congress met, which should have relieved every person in the South from the treason consequent on the rebellion.

As you all know, I never had any delicacy in stating the positions I assume and occupy. I feel to-day for the downtrodden people of the South who are now subject to despotism and tyranny and held under the yoke of bondage. The conduct of this Congress toward them would be in the eyes of the civilized world a sufficient cause for rebellion. I protest against despotism and tyranny in every form, and especially against the despotism of this Congress. I warn the people of the United States that their liberties are about to be taken from them by a Congress imbued with crazy fanaticism, who are engaged in plotting the destruction of the fairest Government ever framed by men.

I am in favor of general amnesty and pardon, and there are others, men in the Republican party, who are in favor of the same thing. Horace Greeley, the leading light of the black Republican party, is in favor of general amnesty and general suffrage, and he says that if he cannot get general suffrage he wants general amnesty any way. He came here and offered himself as bail for Jefferson Davis. He wants that man relieved from the punishment now inflicted upon him by being kept in prison for two or three years after the offense was committed, and deprived of a speedy trial to which the basest criminal is entitled by our organic law.

This Congress outstrips in wicked despotism the worst Parliaments of England. Its action disgraces and degrades the people of this country. It is inimical to the Constitution of the United States, and as long as God Almighty gives me breath I for one will raise my voice against such despotic conduct whether it comes from the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of the Government. The white people of this country were born freemen, and I shall do all I can to have them die freemen.

I have seen enough of the course of this Congress upon these questions to make a lover of his country shed tears of blood. The whole object of its legislation appears to be to punish the South. We do not hear in these Halls, except from a few individuals, any utterance of charity, Christian sympathy, or magnanimity with regard to the people of the South. The southern people are a brave people. They have fought for what the great body of them believed a just and righteous cause, and they have been defeated; but they have done nothing but what thousands and thousands have done in former days in rebelling against both monarchies and republics. The recent rebellion of the southern people was simply an uprising against a Government whose powers they believed were exercised in a despotic and unconstitutional manner. Yet I am not here to justify their action; I am here to condemn it, as I have always done. I did what I could to prevent their success in the rebellion. Yet I have sufficient charity in my heart to be willing to accord to the great masses of the southern people honesty of intention. This was demonstrated by their exhibitions of valor and their outpouring of blood in their conflict with the heroic Army and Navy of the United States. And when the President wiped out the consequences of their guilt through the pardoning and amnesty power he did but imitate the example of our Saviour, who in order to pardon a condemned man shed His own precious blood upon the cross. The gratitude of posterity and of civilization throughout the world will be poured upon the great name of Andrew Johnson for his humanity and charitable conduct.

This country must be united at some time. We cannot continue in our present state of division and alienation. The civilized world is now looking with pain and amazement at the spectacle which our country presents. And, sir, I tell you that though the people of the South may be obliged for a time to submit to the galling yoke of despotism, reason and judgment will eventually assert their sway, and the day is not far distant when the bright casket of human liberty will be again intrusted to the hands of men who will transmit it to their descendants as we received it from our fathers of the revolutionary era.

In speaking on this subject I employ strong language; I do not intend any disrespect toward anybody on either side of this House. Gentlemen on both sides of the House will bear me witness that I have always treated them in a courteous and gentlemanly manner. I have no ill-will or antipathy toward any member of this House; but I implore gentlemen, in behalf of my country, in behalf of those who are to come after us, to join with me and others on this side of the House in an effort to reunite this country in a bond of fraternal affection upon the basis of the Constitution and the old Union established by our patriotic forefathers, so that we may again become the envy and admiration of the civilized world.

My motive in thus plainly talking is to warn the people of approaching danger that they may stand upon the watch-towers and guard the citadel of their liberties against Girondists and Jacobins who would destroy their country for political power. It springs from an earnest and sincere desire to promote the best interests of my country. I see with pain the spirit of vengeance which gentlemen here are seeking to exercise toward the people of the South, and I implore Almighty God that He may enlighten their consciences to a sense of the real demands of the country before we are plunged into another revolution. May Christian love and charity prevail and the innocent mother and harmless babe of the South no more be the victims of the fire and smoke that once ascended from the dwelling which sheltered age and infancy.

As a matter of law, as well as of policy and justice, the legislation now proposed should not be adopted. Why, sir, if the doctrines which are advocated here be correct, none of the men of the South who have been engaged in rebellion can be indicted or convicted for treason. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in the honesty of whose sentiments I fully believe, has proclaimed—and the declaration has been seconded by the other gentlemen on that side, and has been embodied in a preamble to a resolution or bill presented in this House—that the southern States are out of the Union and have lost their constitutional relations to the Government of the United States, and are dead in law, and their people public enemies; that those States have become mere Territories, and bills have been introduced for the purpose of declaring and enforcing this doctrine.

If this be the true view, then why should we undertake to repeal the law which limits the time within which those men can be indicted and tried for treason? For if those States are out of the Union and have lost their constitutional relations to the Government of the United States, then they must have constituted a de facto Government; and those who participated in that de facto Government, the only Government that could give them protection, cannot, according to the principles of public and international law, be convicted of the crime of treason. Men cannot be guilty of treason to a Government to which they do not owe allegiance. No man who is not a citizen of the United States can be convicted of treason against the United States for being engaged in a war against them. If those who were engaged in the rebellion were, by virtue of their secession, taken outside of the Union, then they do not come within the constitutional provision in regard to treason. They were subjects of a de facto Government, and according to the principle settled in the English and American law adherence to such a Government in opposition to a Government de jure cannot render an individual guilty of treason.

We all know that the rebellion was brought about by the Radicals of the North and South; one set to destroy slavery and the other to preserve it. The Radicals of the North were all the time hounding the people of the South. In fact they are more accountable for the rebellion than the people of the South, because the people of the South had reason to believe from what was stated in the speeches and in the public press of the North that they would be permitted quietly to secede. It was well known that Horace Greeley advocated secession. We know that throughout the length and breadth of the North men of character in the different States proclaimed that the South had the right to secede.

Now, after they have failed in the act of secession, after the rebellion has been put down, after you have laid waste their fields, burned their cities, desolated their homes, destroyed all their branches of industry, is it not time to show some magnanimity, some charity, and to say that after three years have elapsed from the time those offenses were committed they shall go acquitted? I know you would hesitate to pass a resolution in this House saying that the people of Ireland, who are fighting against the despotism and tyranny of England, were guilty of treason and should be hung. Do we not know that the President is using all the peaceable machinery of the Government of the United States to prevent the Canadian Government executing upon the gallows men who went upon its soil, having their base of operations here, for the purpose of relieving the millions of the downtrodden people of Ireland from the yoke of bondage in which they are held by the Queen of England.

Gentlemen, there is no difference to-day between the status of the people of the South and the people of Ireland, except that the people of Ireland have less despotism exercised over them by the English Government than the people of the South have by you; because the people of Ireland have some representation in the British Parliament, while the people of the South, with the exception of one single State, and that not having a republican form of government, have none. I mean Tennessee. I know perfectly well if I should offer a resolution in this House protesting against hanging the Fenians in Canada, every man in this House, especially the Radicals who pretended at the recent elections to be great friends of the Irish, would cordially vote for it.

Perhaps, however, you will not be so friendly now, as you have had all the use you can make of the Fenians for the present. I want to see your friendship by the repeal of the neutrality laws. Why do you feel willing to extend your sympathy and hospitality to the people of Poland, Hungary, Ireland, and other countries where revolutions have taken place, and want to hang your own countrymen for being engaged in a like revolution? Why will you extend the hand of charity and friendship to them and refuse it to the people of the South?

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand the gentleman to make reference to my own State. I do not know precisely the terms in which he referred to it, and I would like to have him repeat them.

Mr. ROGERS. I said there was one State in the Union which had representation in Congress from the South, and that was one without a republican form of government, one governed by despotism, where three fifths of the people are disfranchised, where an oligarchy or aristocracy rules over the people.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman's remarks relieve me from some misapprehension I was under from the previous portion of his speech, in which he announced that in a short time, perhaps after the 4th of March, this country would be governed by despotism and its liberties be gone. I suppose now he means to be understood that the people of the whole country will be governed by a policy similar to that which prevails at this time in Tennessee, by which the State is governed by the loyal people, those who have been its friends, those who during all our troubles have stood by it, those who by their sacrifices and efforts have saved it as a nation among the nations of the earth. If that is his meaning I congratulate the country it is going to pass, as I believe it will, into the hands of that class of the people who during this generation and every succeeding generation will continue to manage and control its affairs.

Mr. ROGERS. No State is a free one with a republican form that by force deprives three fifths of her white male voting population of the right of self-government. That is the case in Tennessee. Its government, as administered, is a despotism, and that was the only reason that induced Congress to give her representation, knowing that as but few but Radicals could vote her power would be at least equally balanced in the House. When I speak of this Congress being a despotism I speak of the very same causes that induced our fathers to rebel against the mother country—because the Parliament of England taxed the people of these Colonies without allowing them representation. I say that this Government taxes the people of the South millions and millions of dollars without allowing them representation in the law-making department, that this is a tyranny and a despotism that ought to be discontinued by every Union-loving man, and that I hope succeeding generations will scoff at and put down.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. There happen to be some four million people in this country who for a good many years have not only been taxed without representation, but enslaved without their consent.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir. Three fifths of the slaves and all the free negroes have always been represented and taxes paid for them. They were not citizens, and your constitutional amendment, which you ask the South to adopt, proves they were not citizens. You propose by virtue of it to make them citizens, for which there is no necessity if they were so before. Yet three fifths of the slaves and all the free negroes, who were not citizens of the United States, have had heretofore a representation allowed to them in the Congress of the United States. I am not here to find fault with the policy of a State as to who shall be allowed to vote, but I am here to claim that great right of representation in conjunction with taxation which our fathers maintained and for which they fought for more than seven years against the mother country.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to congratulate the gentleman on having accepted my convictions, and to ask him whether I understood him rightly; whether, now that the people of whom we speak are citizens, slavery having been abolished, he agrees with me that they should not be taxed unless they are represented. He says he did not deem them entitled to representation while they were slaves. Does he think them entitled to representation now that they are citizens?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman does not understand my premises. I have not yet admitted, and nobody can draw that inference from my remarks, that the free negroes of this country were citizens of the United States. Sir, it was understood in the early history of the country, and was settled in the Dred Scott case, and it has been followed from that time to this, that the free negro was not a citizen and he is not a citizen now; and to prove that he is not, it is only necessary to refer to the amendment which you ask the people of the South to adopt so as to make these very free negroes citizens of the United States. If they were citizens before, and if they are still citizens, what is the use of having the South or the North ratify that amendment? The submission of the amendment to them is an admission on the part of every radical member of this House that they are not citizens or entitled to all the privileges and immunities of white citizens. They should not be taxed without representation, and are not deprived of representation, for all are to be counted in the basis of representation.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to ask my friend from New Jersey whether it is not true that since 1789 the negroes of the southern States and of all the States have been represented in Congress?

Mr. ROGERS. Most certainly, all of them have been represented, and three fifths of the slaves. My question is not about too much representation, but because the South have no representation. My point is that this Government does not give to the southern States any representation at all. I do not care how far you allow the negroes to be represented, for they are all now to be counted, as they are all free. You cannot extend representation too far, because our fathers founded representation on population, and I want the whole population of this country to be represented. But the question now arises as one between despotism and liberty, a question wherein the majority of this Congress by the exercise of unlawful, unauthorized, and unconstitutional powers are depriving our southern brethren of their rights of representation and still taxing them as did Great Britain her Colonies.

Mr. KELLEY. I understood the gentleman to state the question as one between despotism and liberty, and it is upon that point I wish to interrupt him. I understand him to assert that that is despotism which denies to a citizen representation, and I desire to ask him whether that is liberty or despotism which denies to millions of its people not only representation but citizenship and yet taxes them.

Mr. ROGERS. It is not citizenship I complain of but the want of representation, and as I before stated all the negroes have representation. If the gentleman's theory of despotism as to suffrage and citizenship be correct, then our fathers who framed the Constitution of the United States were despots themselves, because they did not grant the right of suffrage to the people of this country by virtue of the Constitution, and only made white persons citizens, but left each of the States to regulate and control those subjects for itself, and all I ask is that each State in this Union shall have the right to regulate and control this question of suffrage and citizenship according to its own will. I want South Carolina and New Jersey and the other States to settle for themselves this matter of citizenship and suffrage as the Constitution gives them authority to do, and to allow such persons to vote as they please. And if they allow all negroes and all women and children and all foreigners to vote I will not find any fault, because it will be but an exercise of the sovereign power of the State expressly reserved to it, and over which this Congress has no control.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman misunderstands the scope of my question. I did not ask him as to the opinion of the founders of the Government, but those of the leader of the Democratic party in the House. Is he in favor of denying the right of representation and citizenship to four millions of the American people and their posterity, and will he declaim against that as despotism which asks that every man shall be a citizen, and that no citizen who is not allowed a free voice in electing his Representative shall be taxed directly or indirectly?

Mr. ROGERS. Sir, my position is simply that I am opposed to imposing upon the people of the South citizenship or suffrage by virtue of any congressional legislation or of amending the Constitution so as to give that power. I want each State to legislate on and control this question of citizenship and suffrage according to its own will. I claim that the power is in the hands of the people of each State to control and legislate on their own domestic policy, according to their own individual wishes, and

I say that there is no authority in the Federal Government delegated to it by the States that will authorize three fourths of the States to take away, by virtue of a constitutional amendment, any reserved powers not delegated and handed over to the Federal Government in the formation of the Constitution of the United States. I have always taken the ground that you cannot amend the Constitution of the United States so as to affect powers that did not come within the scope and meaning of the delegated powers. That is my position. Because if you can you can amend it so as to strike down and destroy every fundamental and reserved power which the Constitution gives to the States and which the States withheld from the Federal Government at the time it was established. That is my position. I am for liberty as much as any one, but I am not in favor of negro suffrage. I oppose negro suffrage in every shape and form.

Mr. THAYER. I understand the gentleman to say that he is for liberty as much as anybody else. I ask him if he did not vote against the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir, upon the very simple ground that the institution of slavery was one that belonged to the States and one which the States had not delegated to the Federal Government.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understood the gentleman to say that he opposed the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. My recollection is that he did not vote on the subject.

Mr. ROGERS. The first time I voted; the next time I did not. I did not vote on it the second time because I was sick upon my bed, and the physician who attended upon me will file an affidavit that I was unable to leave my bed at that time. I was confined to my room for six days. I would have deemed it a duty and a pleasure if my health would have allowed me to have voted against it. But if has been passed, the slaves are free, and as long as I live I will stand by and maintain their freedom. Slavery was made the corner-stone of the rebellion, and when the rebellion went down it went down with it. It was submitted to the arbitrament of arms, and the decision went against it. It is now dead and gone, and when it rises again somebody else must blow the horn of resurrection. I never was in its favor in the abstract, but sustained the right of the States to control it as they pleased.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman said a little while ago that in his opinion the constitutional amendment was void. Now he says that the negroes are free, and he admits the fact. I want to know from him how he reconciles these two statements.

Mr. ROGERS. I do it in two ways. One is that any law upon the statute-book, or any amendment to the Constitution, commands the obedience and respect of every law-abiding man in the land until it is repealed or set aside by some competent authority. The other and main reason is, that the rebellion was founded upon the institution of slavery, being inaugurated to preserve that institution; it was submitted to the arbitrament of arms, the highest arbitrament known to civilized nations, and the decision was against it. I am not for reviving anything that was destroyed by the results of the war, and there is no authority to revive an institution that was submitted to such an ordeal. It is an institution that never should have existed. It is now a dead issue, and the question is not how to free the blacks from slavery but how to free the southern whites, who are held in a worse slavery than were the negroes before the war.

But the war did not destroy the States or their rights and institutions. The war does not authorize the representatives of the nation to break down the Constitution and trample it under their feet; to prostrate the old Union and destroy the liberties of the country. The war only authorized us to carry out the fundamental principles of the Constitution. And when we go against that we are morally as guilty of treason as were any who engaged in the late rebellion.

It makes no difference to me what the opinions of others may be, for I am entitled to my own opinions, and although I am in the minority I will stand by the President of the United States. I stand by him from one end of his plan of reconstruction to the other. And I believe he will go down to posterity honored and loved for his pure patriotism and self-devotion to the Constitution of his country. [Laughter.] And although he may be scoffed at, ridiculed, abused, and trampled upon by traitors and disunionists to the Constitution of their country, his countrymen will cause it to be written in letters of gold upon the altars of constitutional liberty, charity, and Christianity, that he stood as a barrier against the tide of despotism, vengeance, barbarism, and tyranny which but for him would have shaken down the Constitution and laws of his country and implanted a monarchy upon their ruins. [Great laughter.]

I know you laugh and scoff over the downfall of liberties made venerable by the care of a century. I know you exalt over the successive blows struck at public liberty and public law. I know that no sense of the future of this country will arrest the reckless clouds of despotism and tyranny that now hover over you in your hour of frantic revelry. Still you will find one here, as long as I am here, and that will be for a short period, [laughter,] who will protest against your wicked machinations to destroy our country. You may laugh, but I have a right as a Representative of the people to express my sentiments, and I am going to express them. And the only way you can prevent me, as long as your Speaker allows me my rights as one of the members of the committee, will be for you to do as you have done with several other honorable gentlemen, expel me from the floor of the House. I have always been respected by this House, because I have openly and boldly, but respectfully stated my principles, the honest convictions of my heart.

I know, sir, that I am human; I know that God has not given me power to foresee the momentous events of the future. But my heart is wedded to the Constitution, and I desire when I die to transmit that rich inheritance as a legacy unimpaired to my descendants to the remotest generation. I wish to preserve our Constitution and Union as the brightest casket of civil liberty that was ever witnessed on the eastern or the western continent. I wish to preserve our noble fabric of Government from the effects of the destructive measures urged by the degenerate sons of noble sires, who fought and bled for the very liberties which I am now defending amid the scoffs and jeers of these Radicals. [Derisive laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must come to order.

Mr. ROGERS. Gentlemen of this House, and the Speaker especially, will bear me witness that I have always extended the utmost courtesy to members on both sides of the House. I advocate my own views. I do not undertake to speak for anybody else. Each man is entitled to his own views and is bound to advocate the opinions which he entertains; and when he believes that the Constitution is being violated and his country destroyed, he is bound to interpose his voice, feeble though it be, against the violation. This is the reason why I have talked so plainly. I feel it my duty to warn the people of the impending danger. Although I am a young man, and my warning voice may not be heeded, although my words are scoffed at here, as they will be by Radicals who read my remarks when published, yet I have the satisfaction of knowing that what I have said here to-day has been prompted by the honest convictions of my heart, and from a desire to preserve that great landmark of civil liberty, the Constitution, which, as administered under Democratic rule, conducted our Government in a career of prosperity and greatness for seventy years.

While I plead here for humanity toward the South, I must not be charged with entertaining any sympathy for rebellion or treason. Gentlemen who now constitute the majority in this House will recollect well the time when their party was in a hopeless minority; yet they were permitted to stand here and proclaim their principles. Shame upon the men, whatever may be their standing or by whomsoever they may be elected, who will undertake in this House to browbeat or stifle an honest Representative who seeks to tell the people the truth and warn them of the disastrous effects which must attend the mad career of radicalism. I am for free speech, and without it liberty is but a myth. Do not ask me to wait for shackles and chains to convince me that liberty is in danger. Do not ask me to close my eyes to the teaching of ages, but allow me when I see despotism and tyranny groping in darkness and silence in undisturbed impunity, and millions of men, women, and children groaning under despotic bondage in my own country, and the most wicked rule of England against which our fathers fought, established in our own land, to protest and use my voice to warn my countrymen of our approaching destruction.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I was detained from my seat when the discussion began this morning, and therefore I have not heard all that has been said. But it appears to me that the debate has assumed a somewhat wider range than the bill immediately under consideration would seem to require. The discussion, however, has presented some points which are well worthy of consideration. In order that the bill may receive that consideration which its importance demands, I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that much of the speech of the gentleman last on the floor [Mr. ROGERS] had certainly no bearing on the bill before the House; but as no member raised any point of order the Chair did not think it proper to interpose.

Mr. ROGERS. Such of my remarks as were not immediately connected with the bill were drawn out by the interrogatories of other gentlemen; otherwise I should have confined myself strictly to the question before the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I certainly did not mean to reflect upon the Speaker or any member of the House.

The motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BREVETS IN UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill relating to brevets in the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read at length, proposes to authorize the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to confer brevet rank on officers in the Army of the United States on account of gallant, meritorious, or faithful conduct in the volunteer service prior to their appointment in the regular Army.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I will explain in a very few words what this bill is intended to effect. The Army of the United States is or soon will be made up by appointments, almost nine tenths of which are of those who have been in the volunteer service. As the law stands at present, officers appointed in the regular Army cannot be breveted for what they have done in the volunteer service of the United States, whereas officers of the regular Army who performed volunteer service under commissions from the States may be breveted for such service. The design of this bill is that officers transferred to the regular Army from the volunteer service may have the same opportunity to receive brevets for meritorious conduct as other officers who were in the volunteer service under commissions from the States. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back Senate bill No. 401, to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States. It is the Army bill of the Senate of the last session, which was disposed of by the committee of conference. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRA PAY.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, also reported back adversely a resolution to extend three months' extra pay to certain officers; which was laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs also was discharged from the further consideration of a memorial on the same subject; and the same was laid upon the table.

ALEXIS GARDAPIER.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back Senate bill No. 308, to confirm the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and the State of Wisconsin, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read.

Mr. THAYER. I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter of the late Commissioner of Public Lands, which contains every explanation in regard to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, May 21, 1866.

SIR: A bill confirming the title to Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land at Green Bay, Wisconsin, has been received with your letter of the 16th instant, and agreeably to your request, that I impart such information to you as this office affords in regard to the merits of the bill, I have the honor to say that the claim of Alexis Gardapier, lying on the west bank of Fox river and more particularly known as vacant strip of land "lying between a tract No. 1 confirmed to Jacques Porlier on the north and tract No. 2 confirmed to Lewis Grignon on the south," &c., appears to be the identical claim as presented to the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress entitled "An act to revive and continue in force certain acts for the adjustment of land claims in the Territory of Michigan," approved February 21, 1823. (See American State Papers, vol. 4, pages 722 and 723.)

The claim was presented on the 16th day of September and was confirmed on the 1st of November, 1823, to Alexis Gardapier with a proviso "that the same shall not interfere with any confirmation heretofore made."

As the prior confirmations to Jacques Porlier on the north of the vacant land and Lewis Grignon on the south of the same (see page 355, A. S. Papers) have already been surveyed and patents issued therefor for lot Nos. 1 and 2 respectively, there exists no impediment to the vacant strip being confirmed by Congress to the extent of 80x3 arpents as applied for by Alexis Gardapier and confirmed by the board of commissioners as aforesaid.

This bill is herewith returned with suggested marginal addenda, conformable to similar bills of relief heretofore passed by Congress, which I deem proper to add to the same for such disposition as you may think necessary.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. EDMUNDS, Commissioner.

Hon. IRA HARRIS, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Private Claims.

During the reading of the letter the morning hour expired, but by unanimous consent the case was proceeded with.

Mr. THAYER. As it is not necessary to detain the House with any remarks on this subject I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed Mr. BROMWELL to fill the vacancy in the select committee on the civil service.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

The next business was the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 664, for the regulation of appointments to and removals from office.

The SPEAKER. The bill is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five minutes' debate so far as the pending amendments are concerned.

The pending amendment is the following, to come in at the end of section two:

Provided, however, That so much of this section as makes the office vacant beyond the time of the refusal of the Senate to advise and consent to a renomination shall not be held to apply to cases of commissions to fill vacancies happening during the recess and which, under the Constitution, are made determinable at the end of their next session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the amendment I have submitted is not sufficiently intelligible in itself I propose to state in a few words its object. The first clause of this section it will be observed provides that in case of the refusal of the Senate to advise and consent to the nomination or renomination of any officer whose term of office may have expired by its own limitation, the place filled by such person shall be regarded as being vacant from the time of such refusal. Now, this provision, standing as it does without the proviso I have suggested, would infringe the Constitution of the United States, which defines the term of the officer. In that case, as it will be remembered by the House, the President is authorized to fill up the vacancy with a commission which will entitle the officer to hold until the end of the next session of the Senate. The object of the proviso is to prevent any conflict between this section and that provision of the Constitution of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by adding to the section as it now stands the following:

And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled, as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

This is a provision proposed by the joint select committee on retrenchment, and meets the approval of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to accept it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next amendment is in section four, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the section with the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS as modified, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the heads of the several Departments of the Government shall hold their offices, respectively, for and during the official term of the President by whom they were appointed, unless removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and they shall severally appoint their assistants and all other officers pertaining to their respective Departments, subject to the approval of the Senate, on report to be made to that body if then in session, or if during the recess, at the next meeting thereof, to hold for the like period, unless removed with the like concurrence of that body.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] proposes to amend the amendment.

Mr. HALE. That obviates the necessity for my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This section it will be observed consists of two propositions. The first makes the heads of the several Departments irremovable at the mere pleasure of the President. Having thus made them, as I think, practically independent, then the second clause authorizes them to appoint, as we have unquestionably a right under the Constitution to do the subordinates in their respective Departments. This clause is so framed as to take it out of the rule or precedent established by the Congress of 1789, to the effect that in the absence of any statutory provision or of any legislation defining the term of office the President might remove at will. I propose here, in order to obviate all possible difficulty on this ground, to define the term. As it stood originally in the bill it was in the words, "for the term of four years." It was suggested by my friend from Iowa and other gentlemen that this would make a difficulty at the incoming of a new Administration. I have endeavored to obviate that by so modifying the section as to confine the period to "the official term of the President by whom they were appointed."

The second clause is dependent. If the first should prevail I see no reason why the other should not prevail also. If, in other words, the heads of the Departments can be lifted from their present abject attitude and made independent of the Executive, then I see no reason against conferring the appointing power upon those officers. Under our present legislation and under the precedent that has already been established, so far as regards the Post Office Department, we know in some few cases, where the salary is some one thousand or two thousand dollars, the appointments are made by the Postmaster General without any supervisory power or power of revision in any quarter, except it be on the part of the President himself; and I think the experience of the country shows how this power has been abused. I think there ought to be a limitation on it. I propose, therefore, that no appointment shall be made except subject to the approval of the Senate, and no removals except upon the same terms.

When I offered this amendment, or when it came up yesterday in another form, in regard to this point of making the heads of the Departments independent of the President, I confess I was a little surprised—and I trust I may be pardoned for saying a little pained—at the result of the vote, which was taken in a thin House. I was not allowed the privilege, or perhaps I ought to say I did not claim it in time, for having the yeas and nays on the question, and the gentleman from Iowa, with the aid of the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, was enabled to defeat the proposition. I propose, as I said, to make these appointments independent.

The gentleman from Iowa, in his remarks yesterday, had something to say in reference to the confidential relations of these officers to the President. He seemed to think that they were intended to be confidential advisers of the President. I do not know that any such thing as advisers of the President is known to the Government. I suppose the President may take advice elsewhere; and if he should take such advice it would perhaps be better and more honest than that he now receives.

Mr. KASSON. I oppose this amendment for several reasons. The first is that the proposition is that the heads of the several Departments of the Government shall hold their offices respectively for the term of four years, or for the presidential term. There are but three departments of the Government, one is the legislative, one the executive, and one the judicial. I apprehend that the object is not to limit Chief Justice Chase's tenure of office to the presidential term as the head of our judiciary, or our Speaker's as the head of this branch, the legislative. A change should be made by striking out the words "of the Government" and inserting before "Departments" the word "Executive."

There is one other point that I will notice. The gentleman states candidly that his object is to try again the issue decided by the House yesterday. I wish to call the attention of the House to the situation of the President and the Secretary of State if this proposition should be adopted. Everything is done in relation to foreign affairs nominally by the Secretary of State, theoretically by the President. If in the settlement of intricate questions of foreign policy a division of policy shall spring up, and the President shall sustain one policy in dealing with foreign nations and the Secretary of State another, you will find the Secretary of State with his hands tied or the President with his hands tied. You must enable the responsible head of the Government to control its policy. You must enable him to change his agent even in the recess of a session of Congress. You must secure harmonious action in the policy of the Government by the President's direct action in the choice of those through whom alone that action can be had.

It is not so only in respect to foreign affairs, but in some respects also to domestic affairs. The President is by law, and to some extent by the Constitution, the responsible head of the executive office. The proposition of the gentleman now, which was defeated yesterday, is to make these Secretaries, who are themselves theoretically or actually agents of the President in respect to his policy, independent of the President, and leaves him but a sounding title in the administration of the affairs of the Government.

Now, I say that this is a radical change of the Government of the United States, and that Congress ought not adopt that change without a more careful consideration than is involved in a proposed change in the tenure of minor officers of the Government. In respect to the Postmaster General's Department, it has already some twenty-seven thousand officers. It is impossible for the President to make all these appointments, and the power must necessarily be vested in the Postmaster General, just as you invest power in the courts to appoint commissioners and in deputy postmasters to appoint their clerks; but this goes further, this goes to the very essence of the Government of the United States, and proposes to take from the President the powers which the Constitution and laws confer upon him.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out the last line of the amendment, simply for the purpose of saying a few words. It seems to me that the proposition which is now made by the gentleman from the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and which I understand to be in substance the precise proposition which the House voted down on yesterday, is called for by no public exigency, and is only fraught with future embarrassment and inconvenience. If the law with regard to the appointing power is so arranged and so bound up that the power shall be controlled by the Senate and the President as regards all the subordinate officers of the Government, I see no possible necessity for trammeling the President in regard to his confidential advisers; or as John Randolph was wont to say, "his head clerks."

It seems to me that it will lead to embarrassment in this way: if a Cabinet officer dissents from the opinions of the Executive, the Executive should possess the power of removing that Cabinet officer; otherwise your plan leads to this result, as was suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that you transfer the executive office from the Executive of the United States to his Cabinet council. And in transferring it you make a new executive consisting of many heads instead of one; because if those officers are not removable from office at the will of the President, they may remain in office and outvote the President; they may take such a course with regard to the administration of the executive office as by a majority of their number they may determine. And what is that but the substitution of a new executive in place of the constitutional Executive? I think the future would reveal the impolicy of the great and fundamental change contemplated by this amendment. It seems to me to be fraught with future evil; to be, indeed, as was said by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] a radical revolution in one department of the Government. I hope, therefore, that the House will adhere to its position of yesterday.

Now, while I am willing to go as far as any man upon this floor is willing to go in order to fetter the appointing power, to assert the constitutional power of the Senate in controlling public appointments, and to restrain usurpations of executive power upon that subject, such usurpations as we have witnessed within the last six months; while I am willing to go as far as any man in that direction with regard to all subordinate appointments under the Government, which is all that is necessary for the protection of the appointing power, I am unalterably opposed to such a change as the one contemplated by the amendment now before the House.

I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] by striking out the following clause:

And shall severally appoint their assistants and all other subordinate officers pertaining to their respective Departments, subject to the approval of the Senate on report being made to that body if then in session, or if during the recess, at the next meeting thereof, to hold for the like period, unless removed with the like concurrence of that body.

There are two or three very important objections to this clause of the amendment. The first is that it introduces into the constitutional practice of the appointing power an element hitherto entirely unknown, and certainly not provided for in words by the Constitution. It is in fact a nomination by the head of a Department, subject to the approval of the Senate. Now, the language of the Constitution is that the President—

"Shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, all officers whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of the Departments."

There is no provision for vesting the appointment in the concurrent action of any two bodies, except that of the President and the Senate. It seems to me it would not be wise to enter upon a policy which is of so doubtful a propriety and of so doubtful a constitutionality as that proposed by this amendment.

Second, I cannot see the ground on which the policy can be justified, even if it were deemed constitutional, of taking away from the President the appointment of a very large class of important officers, and conferring them upon officers subordinate to the President. I do not believe that we should legislate in a bill of this character for to-day merely, for the present Executive, or with reference to the differences that exist between the present Executive and Congress. I believe we should seek to frame a bill which should be of general unlimited application, and which should be found to work well through all time. But this proposes to take from the President the appointment of all the Assistant Postmasters General, the assistant secretaries of the different Departments, the collectors of all our ports, and marshals of all our districts, and give that appointment to the heads of the Departments, subject to the approval of the Senate.

But, again, this bill also provides that the appointment of every clerk in the Departments, of every employé down to the very lowest grade of the civil service, shall be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. There are about thirty thousand of these officers. If the appointments of all these postmasters, clerks, deputy marshals, deputy custom-house officers, &c., are to be sent to the Senate, then it appears to me that body has before it a duty that will engross its entire time to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to ask him whether he regards clerks as "officers" within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. HALE. Certainly I regard a clerk as an officer; and a watchman in one of the Departments is an officer. I had not supposed there was any doubt about that. Certainly postmasters are officers; and here are I do not know how many thousand postmasters whose appointments are to come before the Senate for confirmation. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment which I propose will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, in order that I may renew it, I would like to say a word or two.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my amendment for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I renew the amendment. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to my friend from Iowa that, in using the term "heads of Departments," I followed the language of the Constitution, as I endeavor to do in all cases. I refer the gentleman to that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to "vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to read another clause of the Constitution? It provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." The proposition now is to vest it in the Secretaries. In the second place, the Constitution provides that—

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Now this bill proposes to vest the appointing power in the heads of the Departments, with the concurrence of the Senate. That, I hold, is an explicit violation of the Constitution. If the appointing power be vested in the heads of Departments it must be exclusive; we cannot authorize them to send nominations to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not yield the floor for the purpose of enabling the gentleman to make an argument, for my time is restricted. I say the gentleman has failed to make good the distinction he asserted. He said that the language of the bill is erroneous; that it would comprehend the judiciary as well as the other departments. I affirm that the language used in the bill is the constitutional language. When the Constitution declares that Congress may vest the appointment of certain officers "in courts of law or in the heads of Departments," the latter phrase was surely not intended to comprehend the legislative, executive; and judiciary departments of the Government.

But I desire to say a word in reply to my colleague, [Mr. THAYER.] He thinks there is no necessity for controlling the exercise of this enormous power, which has been so long enjoyed and so much abused by the Executive—abused not merely now, but in previous administrations of this Government; abused now, as we know from declarations publicly made, for the very purpose of thwarting and setting aside the will of this nation as expressed by its representatives. I think the gentleman has not read the elections aright. He certainly has not read them as I have. Perhaps he has not interested himself in them to quite the same extent.

Mr. THAYER. My colleague, I am sure, does not intend to misstate my position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir.

Mr. THAYER. He will then allow me one word of explanation. What I said was that, in my view, there is no necessity for interfering with the Cabinet officers in this respect and departing from what I conceive to be the intention of the Constitution on this subject, while the control of the appointment of every other officer remains as at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will only add that, judging from the debate in the Congress of 1789, if the idea had not generally prevailed that this power could not be taken away from the President, that, in other words, it could be exercised by him alone, a majority of that Congress would never have consented to lodge it there. And let me say to my Democratic friends, who may be considered as representing by a sort of apostolic descent the anti-Federalists of 1789, that I am now maintaining precisely the same position which was occupied by their supposed forerunners in the Congress of 1789.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the doctrine which has been advanced by my colleague from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] in regard to the executive department of the Government as correct. I find, sir, that the Constitution says that the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States of America. Now, I should like to know what there is in the executive part of the Government as we find it in the Constitution which would confer upon the heads of Departments power to override the President of the United States in the determination of any policy however independent of the President you may make these heads of Departments? What right has a head of a Department to a policy except it be that policy established by law? What right under the operation of this amendment offered by my colleague on the Judiciary Committee would the heads of Departments have to convene themselves together and override the President in the exercise of his power? The President is, as the Constitution says, the Executive of the United States. He is to execute—what? He is to execute the law, and any policy which he may have, or which his Cabinet may have, or the two combined may have, in violation of law, is a violation not merely of the law, but of the Constitution itself.

Now, sir, the practice that this amendment proposes radically to change in the executive branch of our Government is one which has obtained too often and too long in our Government. It is in regard to foreign affairs and the administration of domestic concerns as alluded to by my colleague from Iowa. Sir, it is the duty of the legislative department of the Government to determine the policy of the Government, internal and foreign. The laws passed by Congress impose duties upon the President and upon the heads of Departments, and they are to see to the execution of these laws. I ask any gentleman to point out to me how we are creating another branch of the executive department. I say Cabinet officers, if you are pleased to call them such, shall hold their offices during the term of the President by whom they are appointed. How does that make them independent in the determination of the policy of the President? What have they to do but to obey the laws and to obey the order the President may issue as Executive of the United States? Suppose a Cabinet officer should have one line of policy in his Department, and the President should conclude that another line of policy should be pursued, what has the President to do but to order this head clerk to pursue his policy? Suppose he should disobey any mandate of the legislative department embodied in law, what right has he to override the order of the Executive of the United States, who is made by the Constitution chief executive officer, any more than he has to override a mandate of the law, provided the order of the President is within the proper limits of the executive power?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted on the amendment and on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to renew that amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the Philadelphia district, [Mr. THAYER,] has made a proposition which it seems to me is entitled to great consideration as to what might be the practical effect of denying to the President the right to control the appointment and removal of those who immediately surround him, what are ordinarily called his constitutional advisers, heads of Departments, invited to consult with him from time to time. He says if that be made the law of the land, the consequence would necessarily follow you would make the heads of Departments so independent of the President that upon every question of policy considered in Cabinet meeting they would vote down the President, and thus an executive power would be built up unknown to the Constitution. The gentleman shakes his head. I understood him to make that argument.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman will allow me a moment to explain. He does not understand what I said.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. THAYER. What I meant to say, and what I presume the House understood me to say, was this: it will be practically impossible for any executive department to carry on this Government without a certain degree of harmony between those who administer the Government in his name and upon his responsibility. I say if in their collective capacity these gentlemen are opposed to him, he will of necessity be compelled to yield. It will be impossible to resist their joint influence, and in that manner they will become practically a new executive.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is precisely as I understood the gentleman—that they will practically become a new executive unknown to the Constitution. Now, I entirely concur with the gentleman in his opposition to this section and desire the amendment as proposed by my friend from New York. But I put my reasons on an entirely different condition of things. I hold that instead of building up a Cabinet power against the President we should strip him of all advisers who have any responsibility resting upon them if we pass this law. What is a Cabinet officer? Not anything known to your laws. The President by the Constitution has a right to call for information from the heads of Departments and to ask their opinion; out of this has grown up the usage or practice of assembling them around him as his advisers. There is no law requiring him thus to consult with them in Cabinet meeting, and the time was when these same officers were not called to advise with him. The Postmaster General was not formerly called a Cabinet officer. By and by he was called in to advise. And so in regard to the Attorney General. Thus it is not a matter of law but of usage.

Now, if you say the President shall not have the control of appointments and removals of the heads of Departments, who by usage are his advisers, what will he do? He will call none of those heads of Departments to advise with him; he will have a kitchen Cabinet; he will reign supreme and alone. He has as much right to call somebody outside to advise with him as to call upon these men in what are called Cabinet councils—not morally, not properly, but so far as any letter of the law is concerned. He may call upon his youngest clerk to advise with him, and the practical effect will be just as bad, I think, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] supposes, but as I think for a different reason, you will compel the President to give up Cabinet meetings if you force upon him those he does not personally trust, and make him resort to others for the advice which those known to the law as heads of the Departments are ordinarily called upon to give him.

Mr. THAYER. I wished to ask the gentleman before he sat down whether the popular usage to which he has referred, authorizing the administration of the executive department of the Government, by the aid and advice of these Cabinet officers, has not become by an interrupted usage a part of the public law; and whether in his opinion the people of this country would now tolerate the dismissal of these officers by the Executive, and the attempt to carry on the Government without any of their aid.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I may be permitted to reply, I will say that an appeal will have to be made to the people in that case. We are now endeavoring by such acts of legislation as are within our constitutional power to control this matter. If we go so far that we have no power to control it as a legislative body, we then throw the matter over upon the people. The gentleman admits everything I claim when he makes it an appeal to the people for the exercise of legislative power.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to oppose the section. There is nothing clearer to my mind than that the last clause of this section is in direct conflict with the express letter of the Constitution. No attempt of this sort has ever before been made in an American Congress. The provision of the Constitution is as plain as it is possible for man to write it, that all appointments that are to be made with the concurrence or consent of the Senate must be made by the President. Therefore I cannot well see how the mover of this bill can persist in having an argument running on here upon a section of the bill which contains a clause of this sort in direct contravention of the instrument under which we are assembled and by the authority of which alone we legislate. That clause of the bill is as follows:

"The heads of Departments shall severally nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, all their assistants and other officers within their respective Departments."

Now, how can this become law while the Constitution contains the following provision:

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

What appointments are herein—that is, in the Constitution—otherwise provided for than by the President with the consent of the Senate? It is provided therein that Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. Congress cannot by these terms vest by law these appointments in the President and courts, for it must be in him alone; and to say they can by law vest them in the courts with the Senate is simply to disregard plain words, and would justify an enactment that the courts and town constables jointly might make such appointments. If there is any provision of the Constitution which in any manner authorizes this kind of color legislation I would like to know what it is. The proposition is that—

"The heads of these several Departments of the Government shall hold their offices respectively for four years, unless removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and shall severally nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, all their assistants and other officers within their respective Departments."

The point I make is that there is no officer known to the Constitution who is authorized to appoint to office with the consent of the Senate but the President of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Constitution says that "the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such officers as they may think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Mr. BINGHAM. That has nothing to do with nominations to the Senate or appointments made by the President with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is mistaken as to the terms of the amendment as it now stands. It does not propose a nomination to the Senate. It places the power in the hands of the Department, subject to approval and consent after the appointment is made.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman then has some other bill than that which been printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is in the printed bill. I modified it some days ago.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman says the printed bill is not the bill as now pending. I should like then to know what that bill is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated several times that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has modified his bill in several particulars. The Clerk will again read the bill as modified.

The Clerk read the bill as modified.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand the language still to be that the heads of Departments shall appoint all their subordinates and assistants, subject to the approval of the Senate. So it is just reported by the Clerk. That is substantially what I before represented it. The modification is only in words, not in substance.

Now, the point I make is simply this, that the provision of the Constitution for the appointment of certain inferior officers is that Congress by law vested in the President alone, or in the courts of law, or heads of Departments the power to appoint such officers; but that provision never contemplated that by law the Senate might be authorized to disapprove such appointments so made either by the President or courts or heads of Departments. It simply provides that the Congress may by law vest the power in the President or courts of law or heads of Departments to appoint the inferior officers of the Government without consulting the Senate. But what is attempted here is, by act of Congress to vest part of this power in the Senate in connection with the heads of Departments. Why not confer it on any other body or person in whole or in part? [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment with the understanding that it will be renewed.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I renew the amendment to the amendment. If I rightly apprehend the drift of the debate, it does seem to me that we are now in danger of falling into some inconsistency in this legislation. There are two constitutional views that have been entertained in this country in regard to this matter of the power to appoint and to remove superior officers of the Government. One class of opinion holds that the Constitution requires, in order to the removal of those whose appointments must be confirmed by the Senate, that the Senate should also assent to the removal. That opinion is the one that was presented very ably by the gentleman who introduced this bill, supported by the very highest class of opinions and authorities; the result of all of which is that it is not constitutional, that it is not competent for Congress to permit, either by legislation or otherwise, a man to be removed without the assent of the Senate who cannot take office without the assent of the Senate. Now, if that be the law, then we can pass this bill. If that be not the law and the practice, then we cannot pass this bill at all; we cannot regulate the matter of removals in those respects in which we propose to do it. But if, on the other hand, the form and scope of this bill is warranted by the Constitution, if, in other words, the Senate must concur in the removal of officers who can only be created by its consent, then it is not competent for us to enable the President, even by law, to remove men from office who cannot take their offices except by the assent of the Senate. Then, sir, what I submit, and all that I submit, is this: let us make our legislation harmonious; let us not say in one section of the bill that a Cabinet officer who must be confirmed by the Senate may be removed without its consent and our constitutional view in that way violated; let us rather strike down the bill entirely.

This power of removal is either executive and in the President alone, or else it belongs to the President and to the Senate together. Do not, therefore, say in regard to Cabinet officers that they can be removed without the assent of the Senate, and as to other officers that that assent must be obtained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] He denies the constitutional power of this Congress to enact the second clause of the amendment now under consideration. I do not understand that he holds any objection to the first clause; he seems to regard it as a clear case; so do I. But we differ tote calo in our conclusions.

Why may we not exercise this power? Why may we not associate the Senate with the heads of Departments in making appointments? The Constitution authorizes us to vest that power either in the President alone or in the heads of Departments or in the courts. Is there anything there that denies to us the power of regulating the exercise of appointments by subordinate officers? It strikes me that I can furnish authority upon this subject which the gentleman will not question; the authority of a very distinguished judge of the Supreme Court of the United States. Judge Story remarks in his Commentaries, in section fifteen hundred and thirty-seven, that as far as Congress has the power to regulate and delegate the appointment of inferior officers, as it unquestionably has, so far they may prescribe the term of office, the manner in which and the person by whom the removal as well as the appointment to office shall be made. That I think is an authoritative answer to the objections of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

But there is still more. When you come to look into this provision of the Constitution you will find that when the President is spoken of in connection with this matter he is spoken of as "the President alone." The Constitution authorizes you to give the appointment to him exclusively. But when the heads of Departments and the courts are spoken of no such language is used. And the inference may reasonably be drawn that in those cases we may associate with them something in the shape of a supervising authority.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. HALE (as renewed by Mr. SHELLABARGER) to the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS.

The amendment to the amendment was to strike out the following:

And shall severally appoint their assistants, and all other subordinate officers pertaining to their respective departments, subject to the approval of the Senate, on report to be made to that body if then in session, or, if during the recess, at the next meeting thereof, to hold for the like period, unless removed with the like concurrence of that body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, but before the result of the vote was announced.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, called for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILLIAMS and HALE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes forty-one; noes not counted.

So one fifth having voted in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 78, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Baker, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Branderage, Bundy, Campbell, Cooper, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, DeFrees, Denison, Dodge, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—36.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, which was to insert an additional section, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the heads of the several Departments of the Government shall hold their offices respectively for and during the official term of the President by whom they were appointed, unless removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall severally appoint their assistants and all other subordinate officers pertaining to their respective Departments, subject to the approval of the Senate, on report to be made to that body if then in session, or, if during the recess, at the next meeting thereof, to hold for a like period unless removed with the like concurrence of that body.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were, yeas 59, noes 60.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 81, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Bidwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Grinnell, Abner C. Hubbell, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuyken, Ladin, Le Blond, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Platts, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stilwell, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Windom, Woodbridge, and Wright—81.

Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Latham, Leftwich, Marston, Morris, Pike, Radford, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Strouse, Nelson Taylor, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, and Winfield—33.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move to postpone this bill until to-morrow, with the direction that it be printed, together with the amendments already adopted, so that we may know the precise shape in which it now is?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order. There are, however, two amendments yet to be voted on.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will wait, then, until they have been voted upon, and then I will make the motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to include in his motion the substitute prepared by the joint select committee on retrenchment, and also the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The next question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to add a new section.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will modify my amendment so that the section I propose to add will read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any disbursing officer or any officer having charge of public money to pay any money out of the Treasury of the United States or out of any contingent fund, or out of any appropriation whatever, to any person who has been or who may hereafter be nominated by the President to any office for the appointment to which the advice and consent of the Senate is required by law, until the appointment of the person so nominated shall have been confirmed by the Senate; and any public officer who shall pay or receive any moneys, or advise or connive at or consent to the payment of any moneys, in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and on conviction thereof, by impeachment or otherwise, shall be sentenced to removal from office, and shall pay to the United States a sum equal to the amount of moneys so paid or received, to be recovered, with costs, by action of debt, in the name and for the use and benefit of the United States.

This, I believe, will not come in conflict with any other proposition. I can explain in a few words what it is designed to accomplish.

I think no one will doubt the constitutional right of Congress to enact such a provision. It simply declares that whenever any person shall be nominated by the President to an office, for the holding of which confirmation by the Senate is necessary by law, the person so nominated shall not draw pay out of the Treasury of the United States or any fund belonging to the United States until his nomination shall have been confirmed by the Senate; so that, if one man is turned out of office to make room for another, the latter may feel that in assuming the duties of the office he incurs the risk of never getting any pay in case the Senate should refuse to ratify the removal of his predecessor and the appointment of himself. Thus we shall take away the chief motive which actuates men in seeking to make merchandise of the public offices of the United States, namely, "the bread and butter."

The last part of the section makes it an offense, a misdemeanor punishable by law for any disbursing officer of the country, or any officer having charge of any funds, or any officer whatever, to pay out of any appropriation or out of any fund belonging to the United States, to any such person until he shall have been confirmed by the Senate to the office to which he has been appointed. It seems to me we may clearly do this within the scope of the Constitution. No one can doubt our right to do it; and it is proper even to do it as the most successful mode of taking the bread out of these children's mouths, the children of politics and the children of party. I think it is the most appropriate mode we can adopt.

Mr. MILLER. Does it cover vacancies happening during the recess?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will observe it does not cover the case of filling up a vacancy happening during the recess. I call his attention to the fact that my section as drawn refers to appointments by the President under the Constitution. It does not call for an appointment when the vacancy happens in the recess. It is then in the power of the President to fill up the vacancy which happens, temporarily to fill it up, whereas the section I have drawn only refers to nominations made by the President, that the persons so nominated shall not draw pay until they are confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Does it prohibit the drawing of any warrant on the Treasury?

Mr. GARFIELD. That might be well, but if the money is never paid I do not think that drawing of the warrant will be a serious matter. Still I will make no objection if the gentleman desires to make the modification.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to strike out the following words in the fifth, sixth, and seventh lines, "by impeachment or otherwise shall be sentenced to removal from office and."

Mr. Speaker, I make this motion for the reason that it is expressly provided, and very wisely, in the Constitution that the Senate of the United States shall have the sole power to try impeachments; and that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." This provision of the Constitution undoubtedly left the Senate of the United States the only tribunal in the Republic to determine what is an impeachable offense within the meaning of the term misdemeanors. It is not therefore competent for the Congress of the United States to say any particular act made punishable by statute is an impeachable misdemeanor; yet the bill so provides, by declaring certain acts therein specified misdemeanors in office, and that on conviction thereof by impeachment or otherwise the party convicted "shall be sentenced to removal from office."

The five minutes of time to which I am restricted precludes any fit discussion of this important question. I admit that Congress may declare official acts to be misdemeanors, and as such indictable and punishable in the civil courts, but I submit to my colleague that while you may thus subject to imprisonment for life any civil officer on conviction, you cannot empower the civil court to inflict the sentence of removal from office. That power is committed by the Constitution to the Senate. It is provided in the Constitution that notwithstanding the impeachment of an officer he shall be triable in the courts, and therein subject to "judgment and punishment according to law;" yet it was never intended that the power of removal from office for high crimes and misdemeanors should be vested elsewhere than in the Senate of the United States. Vest this power of removal on conviction in the civil courts, and it might result that the Senate after trial as a high court of impeachment of an officer so sentenced by the civil court might refuse to convict and sentence upon the same state of facts.

If my colleague consents to strike the words out as I have moved, I have no objection to his increasing the penalty either by fine or imprisonment. I hope he will not insist on the words being retained. If there is any power which is exclusively vested in the Senate of the United States as a high court of impeachment, it is the power to determine upon their oaths whether the offense charged is a high crime or misdemeanor within the meaning of the terms as used in the Constitution. It is not in the power of Congress by statute to enlarge or to restrict the causes of impeachment as declared in the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I was unable to hear the first part of the gentleman's remarks, but I will not object if he thinks it will make the section more perfect to strike those words out. I should be sorry however if it should be taken as an indication that such persons ought not to be removed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we strike them out it will make the sentence too light.

Mr. BINGHAM. I suggested if the sentence is not heavy enough I would agree to add to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept the modification.

Mr. HALE. I rise to propose an amendment to the amendment by inserting in line four, after the words "of this act," the words "or of any other statute of the United States."

Mr. GARFIELD. That is well enough.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was then read, being offered by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the Government of the United States who shall appoint or commission any person to an office in violation of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and on conviction thereof, by impeachment or otherwise, shall be dismissed from office.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I propose to modify my amendment by striking out the words "by impeachment or otherwise." The object of this amendment is to provide some penalty for violation of duty in the exercise of the appointing power either by the President or by the heads of Departments. It is well known in the history of the country, and not very far back, that the appointing power has been exercised in a manner directly in conflict with the laws of the United States; and yet it has neither been declared by law a misdemeanor nor has any penalty been attached to it. I therefore ask that this amendment may be incorporated in this bill, so that if the President or any other officer of the Government intrusted with the appointing power should exercise it in violation of law he may be reached by impeachment or by conviction in a court, as the case may be, and that if he be found guilty of misdemeanor in office by the high court of impeachment, he may be dismissed from office.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] by striking out the words, "dismissed from office," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000, or imprisoned not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court." I will state briefly my reason for offering this amendment. I think gentlemen will find, when they look at this question considerably, that it was intended when the specific provisions just referred to by me in the discussion of my colleague's [Mr. GARFIELD'S] amendment were put into the Constitution of the United States, to thereby place it beyond the power of a dominant party, a mere majority in the legislative department of this Government, to clothe a court and jury anywhere in this land with the power of impeachment or of pronouncing the judgment of impeachment removal from office. I think it was clearly intended by the men who framed that instrument when they inserted the provision, "the Senate should have the sole power to try all impeachments," and that "the judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States," to limit the legislative power both as to the tribunal to try and the judgment to be pronounced. It seems to me clear that it was intended that this power to try should be confined exclusively to the impeaching tribunal appointed by the people, and that in no event should the people be deprived of their executive head or other civil officer for an impeachable offense on conviction thereof, save by the vote of two thirds of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to suggest that by striking out the words "dismissed from office" his amendment will apply to all appointing officers. Now, I believe with the gentleman that no court upon conviction, other than the high court of impeachment, can remove a President from office; but other courts may remove other officers; and yet the penalty of removal from office, if his amendment shall prevail, will not attach to any such officer. It cannot apply to the President because that would be in contravention of the Constitution. Therefore there is no necessity for it unless the gentleman intends to relieve other officers from liability of dismissal.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was led to the remark by what fell from the lips of the gentleman when he first spoke upon his amendment, the gentleman having said that upon conviction the President of the United States ought to be removed from office.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman will allow me to explain, when I speak of conviction in relation to the President and removal from office I mean by the court authorized to remove him.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, Mr. Speaker, I so understood. There is no misunderstanding.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not believe any other court can do it.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no occasion for any legislation to clothe the Senate of the United States with the power of impeaching the President.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. "There is for other courts."

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman says "there is for other courts," and yet he tells us that he does not desire to clothe "other courts" with the power of removal from office. That is the very thing he is doing by the proposed section. He has struck out the words "by impeachment or otherwise," and leaves the words "on conviction," which means on indictment and trial before a civil court and conviction therein. How does the section stand, then? Why that "any officer of the Government of the United States who shall appoint or commission any person to an office in violation of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office, and on conviction thereof shall be dismissed from office." That clothes the civil courts with power to remove any officer from office, the President not excepted.

Now, what I desire to impress upon the House is, that in my opinion such legislation is in conflict with the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States and with the manifest intent of its framers. I would remind gentlemen of the remarks made by Hamilton on this subject. He said when discussing this question before the people upon the adoption of the Constitution:

"Where else than in the Senate could have been found a tribunal sufficiently dignified or sufficiently independent? What other body would be likely to feel confidence enough in its own situation to preserve unawed and uninfluenced the necessary impartiality between an individual accused and the representatives of the people, his accusers. Could the Supreme Court have been relied upon as answering this description?" "The awful discretion which a court of impeachments must necessarily have, to doom to honor or to infamy the most confidential and the most distinguished characters of the community, forbids the commitment of the trust to a smaller number of persons. These considerations seem alone sufficient to authorize a conclusion that the Supreme Court would have been an improper substitute for the Senate as a court of impeachments."

I therefore insist on my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose the House is about to adjourn, and before it does so I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is now an amendment and an amendment to the amendment pending. No further amendment is in order under the rules.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to propose it so as to have it printed. I propose to strike out all after the first section and insert the three last sections of House bill No. 832.

The SPEAKER. When the amendments are disposed of that motion will be in order under the rules, being a proposition to perfect the original bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that the best thing that can be done now will be to commit this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary and have it printed with all the amendments. I think very few members of the House know precisely the situation of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought the House was about to adjourn and I wish to have my amendment printed.

The SPEAKER. It can be printed by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. BROOMALL. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to make some modifications in my amendment, so that it may be printed. I desire in the eighth line of the first section to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty," and to make the same alteration in the tenth line. And in accordance with the vote had, I propose in the fifth line of the third section to strike out the words "by impeachment or otherwise," and the words "removal from office" in the fifth and sixth line, and insert "imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow; and that meantime the bill with the substitutes and amendments pending be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following amendment as an additional section, in order that it may be printed with the rest:

And be it further enacted, That no appointment to any office in the civil, military, or naval service shall be antedated or take effect prior to the time such appointment was actually made; and no salary or compensation shall be allowed or paid to any officer appointed under the authority of the Government, except from the time such officer actually enters on the duties of his office, nor beyond the expiration of his official term.

No objection being made, the amendment was received.

The motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH was then agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to ask leave to report a substitute for House bill No. 771, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, and for other purposes." I ask that it be printed, as the original bill which has been assigned for consideration on Tuesday next is now out of print.

No objection was made, and the substitute was received and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, namely:

An act (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown and State of Wisconsin; when the Speaker signed the same.

INTERNAL REVENUE FRAUDS.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee for the investigation of frauds upon the internal revenue have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

NEW ORLEANS RIOTS.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all correspondence, reports, and information in his possession in relation to the riot, which is alleged to have occurred in the city of New Orleans on the 30th day of August last.

No objection was made.

The question was upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the resolution is incorrect in one particular. It refers to a riot that occurred in New Orleans on the 30th day of August last. I think it was on the 30th day of July last.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was told that it was in August.

The SPEAKER. The riot was within a few days of the close of the last session, which adjourned on the 28th of July.

Mr. NIBLACK. Very well; I will modify the resolution so as to read, "on the 30th day of July last."

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. DRIGGS, (at twenty-five minutes before four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution directing the Public Printer to cause to be engraved the drawings accompanying the annual report of the Columbian Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and also to print for the use of the institution one thousand additional copies of the report, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 635) to amend an act regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1865, reported adversely thereon.

TRANSPORTATION OF FRICTION MATCHES.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) amending the ninth section of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam,' and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852, have directed me to report it back without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that the resolution had better be printed.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read that we may know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the joint resolution being asked for, it will be read at length.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which proposes to amend the fifth division of the ninth section of the act of August 30, 1852, so that inspectors may, in the license therein provided for, exempt a steamer from the obligation to carry in a safe, chest, or compartment composed of or lined with metal compact packages of friction matches securely packed in strong, tight wooden chests or boxes, the covers of which shall be firmly fastened on by locks, screws, or other fastenings, and which shall be stored in a safe part of the steamer designated by the inspectors in their license and at safe distance from any fire.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Commerce would be kind enough to explain the provisions of the measure. As I understand it, instead of putting additional safeguards around the transportation of goods and passengers which it seems to me the public voice unanimously demands all through the country, this resolution takes off some of those safeguards by permitting vessels to carry friction matches otherwise than in the safe that has hitherto been required by the law to be provided.

Mr. CHANDLER. In 1852 a law was passed which contained the following provision:

"Upon the application of the master or owner of any steamer employed in the carrying of passengers for a license to carry gunpowder, oil of turpentine, oil of vitriol, camphene, or other explosive burning fluids, and materials which ignite by friction, or either of them, the inspectors shall examine such vessels, and if they find that she is provided with chests or safes composed of metal, or entirely lined therewith, or one or more apartments thoroughly lined with metal at a secure distance from any fire, they may grant a certificate to that effect, authorizing such vessel to carry as freight any of the articles aforesaid, those of each description to be secured in such chest, safe, or apartment, containing no other article, and carried at a distance from any fire to be specified in the certificate: Provided, That any such certificate may be revoked or annulled at any time by the inspectors, upon proof that either of the said articles have been carried on board said vessel, at a place or in a manner not authorized by such certificate, or that any of the provisions of this act in relation thereto have been violated."

That act has never been applied to friction matches until September, 1866; nor was the Department aware of the existence of any such law. In September, a man in Louisville discovered the existence of such a law, and for reasons best known to himself called the attention of the Department to the fact, and compelled the Secretary to issue orders that friction matches should not be carried except in metallic cases. No steamboat in the United States is prepared with metallic cases to carry friction matches. The consequence is that the transportation has ceased; they cannot be carried. They are very bulky. One man in Detroit ships two or three car loads a day. No iron safe can be prepared large enough for them. The Secretary of the Treasury stated to me that he had the matter referred, on this application, to an expert, and that expert told him that you might thrust a red-hot iron bar into a box of friction matches, as at present prepared, and they would not ignite unless you withdrew the bar; you must let in air. This is simply a law which was made to apply to something else, and has never been applied to matches until the present moment. A petition has been sent here, asking for a change of the law, by a very large number of wholesale grocers and others who have occasion to sell friction matches, and the Committee on Commerce this morning unanimously directed this joint resolution to be reported, and I asked that it be put on its passage at once because very great inconvenience is being suffered by the people of the western rivers by the enforcement of this law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether this applies to ocean steamers?

Mr. CHANDLER. It applies to all steamers. Chinese fire-crackers have been shipped without being put in metallic cases for the last five hundred years. They are of the same character as these. This resolution simply leaves things as they have always stood heretofore until this law, which was intended to apply to gunpowder and glycerine oil, was brought to apply to friction matches. They are very bulky and it is utterly impossible to provide iron safes for their transportation.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 466) for the relief of William L. Adams; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 467) to amend the act entitled "An act further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes," approved July 25, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 468) in relation to the appointment of marshal and also of register of wills in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. YATES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 469) to provide for the publication of amendments to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 470) to authorize the change of a name; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 471) to authorize the sale of land in certain sand islands to the Mobile Harbor and Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 879) relating to brevets in the Army of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PRINTING OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Secretary prepare for publication a volume containing the colonial charters and the various State constitutions of each State of the United States, together with all amendments thereto at any time in force, arranging the same in chronological order for each State, and that copies thereof be provided for the use of the Senate.

PRINTING OF LAND OFFICE MAPS.

Mr. HOWE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the maps accompanying the late report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to ask a question in regard to that resolution. I presume the maps are to be printed, if printed at all, in connection with the report?

Mr. HOWE. No, not this edition. This is an extra edition that I propose. It is simply an edition of the maps.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I hope the Senator will see the propriety of discharging the Committee on Printing at present from the consideration of that resolution, and the other resolution which was referred to them a few days ago, so that the whole subject may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, that they may consider and make a recommendation upon it, and then it can be referred to the Committee on Printing. It is deemed of great consequence by many who have examined the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that an extra number of it should be printed, and printed with the maps accompanying it, for the purpose of circulation in Europe through the agencies to be connected with the Exposition at Paris in 1867. For that purpose, if the Senator and other Senators will consent, I will move that the Committee on Printing be discharged at present from the consideration of this resolution and the one referred to them the other day, and that both be referred to the Committee on Public Lands for their consideration so that the whole matter may be considered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from California that the maps accompany the report, and will be printed with it.

Mr. CONNESS. I am aware of that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But the reports from the several offices of the surveyors general will not be printed. There is an existing law limiting the reports of the different Departments to a certain number of pages, and because of that law the Commissioner had to leave the reports of the surveyors general out of his report; and if it is the desire of the Senator from California to have the reports of the surveyors general printed there will have to be a special order to that effect. Some of these reports, I presume, are very important, and they have usually accompanied the report of the Commissioner, but under existing laws they cannot.

Mr. CONNESS. My purpose was that this question should have full consideration by the Committee on Public Lands of this body before the Committee on Printing consider it, and I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say that I have very little choice as to whether the resolution goes to the Committee on Printing or to the Committee on Public Lands. I have a resolution in my hand that refers to the printing of some copies of the report of the Commissioner for distribution at the Paris Exposition, and that I propose to send to the Committee on Public Lands. The purpose I had in view in offering the resolution now before the Senate was entirely different; and that was, to get some extra copies of some new maps, very valuable, I think, for home consumption, and not very valuable for foreign distribution.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the whole matter go to that committee.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; I will change my motion and ask to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. RIDDLE. I object. I think the proposition involves a probable expense of $25,000, and the Committee on Printing have been in the habit of investigating these questions and reducing the expenditures. It is usual for such subjects to go to the Committee on Printing, and that committee having investigated them heretofore I think are competent to decide upon the propriety of this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will be on discharging the Committee on Printing, to whom the resolution was referred, from its further consideration and referring it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS. My purpose, I will say to the Senator from Delaware, was not to discharge the Committee on Printing from the consideration of that portion of the question that belongs to them legitimately. When the Committee on Public Lands shall have reported upon the policy of an extra publication, then I desire that that report shall go the Committee on Printing, and in that way we shall get at what the Senate want in all probability. I hope, therefore, that that course will be taken, for it will be regular, and if the Senator will permit me to have the question put on sending the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands, I will make that motion now.

Mr. RIDDLE. I withdraw my objection. That explanation is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then by common consent the Committee on Printing will be discharged from the consideration of the resolution, and it will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, no objection being interposed.

LAND OFFICE REPORT FOR EUROPE.

Mr. HOWE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire and report upon the expediency of printing the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the year ending June 30, 1866, in the different languages spoken on the continent of Europe, for distribution at the Paris Exposition.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. Does that mean all the languages that are spoken in Europe, or only some of the principal ones, such as German and French?

Mr. HOWE. I did not undertake to specify in the resolution just how many languages nor which the report should be printed in, but I proposed to refer the matter to the Committee on Public Lands, who I suppose will determine it.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands have several letters and communications asking to have the report printed in German and French, but the Senate have never ordered any of these reports to be printed in any foreign language, and I do not know whether it would be the sense of the Senate to order them to be so printed now. If the Senate are in favor of this resolution, I think it would be very agreeable to the committee to report it.

Mr. HOWE. The simple question is, whether the Senate will direct the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of such a publication; that is all.

Mr. POMEROY. Very well; let it go to the committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to my colleague whether the question of printing this report in foreign languages and distributing it in foreign countries does not appropriately belong to the committee over which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] presides, the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. HOWE. This question of conflicting jurisdiction here is one that embarrasses me more than any other; and it happens because the boundaries of the different jurisdictions do not seem to be very accurately defined. This is a question of the expediency of printing in the different foreign languages a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office just made to Congress. Now, whether that belongs to the Committee on Public Lands, to the Committee on Printing, to the Committee on Agriculture, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to the Committee on Mining, or to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad I am unable to determine; but I do not think it is of any very great importance which committee does consider it. I propose to have the Committee on Public Lands inquire first and I have no particular objection to its going through the roll of the other committees afterward.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to hear the resolution read again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no desire to take to the committee with which I am connected any other business than that which naturally belongs to it, but by repeated votes of the Senate the whole subject of the Paris Exposition, the appropriations for it, and what the United States should do for its representation there has been referred to that committee, and it has reported repeatedly upon it, and the appropriations which have already been made have been made on the recommendation of that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution. The resolution was adopted.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. WADE. I move that to-morrow be set aside for the consideration of the bills for the admission of Nebraska and Colorado. I wish them acted on at an early day, and I hope we shall meet to-morrow and dispose of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill for the admission of Colorado be made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD. At the last session the two Houses of Congress passed a bill for the admission of Colorado as a State of the Union, and it had the misfortune to encounter the presidential veto, and we have never yet taken up the bill as returned by the President to the Senate for reconsideration. It strikes me that we might very properly proceed to the consideration and disposition of that veto message and the bill which was the victim of it at an early period in this session. I see no necessity, I must confess, for introducing another upon another and separate bill for the admission of Colorado while a bill for the same purpose is still pending before us. I merely throw out this suggestion to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. WADE. That subject is not up. Whether we shall act on the veto message or on a new bill will be proper for consideration when the question comes up. I do not know that that is a very important matter. My object is to have the question disposed of. I find, however, that there is an opposition among Senators to making the bill a special order for to-morrow, and as I do not know that anything is to be gained by that, I will content myself with expressing the hope that we shall not adjourn over from to-day, and I give notice that I shall early to-morrow move to take up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Ohio as withdrawing his motion.

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir. I withdraw it.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the names of the several national banking associations which have failed to comply with the provisions of law requiring a reserve of money on hand; and that he report what legislation, if any, is necessary to enforce against such associations the provisions of the law.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 378) releasing to Francis S. Lyon the interest of the United States in certain lands.

Also, that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the adjournment of the House from Thursday, the 20th instant, to Thursday, the 3d day of January next.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin; and the enrolled bill (S. No. 373) releasing to Francis S. Lyon the interest of the United States in certain lands.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia. That bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] to the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. On this question the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not desire to be heard on the subject.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. Dixon, which was to insert at the end of the first section of the committee's amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That no person who has not heretofore voted in this District shall be permitted to vote unless he shall be able at the time of offering to vote to read and also to write his own name.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I do not know what I might say if this were really an intelligence qualification; but of the fact that the ability of a man merely to write his own name and read it is intelligence I am not informed. One of my friends near me suggests that it is not even necessary that this writing which he is to read should be in the English language; it is not even necessary that it should be in any language other than that of the person who is supposed to be able to read. But, Mr. President, to be serious about this thing, what kind of a qualification is it for the exercise of the duties of an American citizen that he be able to read and write his own name? To write a man's name is simply a mechanical operation. It may be taught to anybody, even people of the most limited capacity, in twenty minutes; and to read it afterward certainly would not be very difficult. I have the highest respect for the sagacity, the intelligence, and the statesmanship of my honorable friend from Connecticut, [Mr. Dixon,] but I really (why it is I am not prepared to say now) cannot see the force of this qualification which he proposes to attach to negro suffrage.

I understand that in Massachusetts—and, by the by, I may as well remark that Massachusetts is "the hub of the universe," even so far as Maine is concerned, and that it is from Massachusetts that we are now to derive all our ideas, particularly upon the subject of Government and upon new reforms—I understand that in Massachusetts a man is not only required to read, but he is required to read the Constitution of the United States. Whether he is required to understand it or no, I am not prepared to say, I am not informed; but I suppose that even Massachusetts herself would not pretend that it was any kind of qualification for a man to read unless he understood, because that has been the difficulty in all ages from the earliest times. The thing was not only to read, but to understand. Now, if it be the case that in Massachusetts a man must read the Constitution and must understand it—I mean not only understand the words in the Constitution but their significance in the connection in which they are found there—then I agree that I will admit and I will go heart in hand for every man as a voter who can do that. The man who can read the Constitution of the United States and who can understand it, understand its words, its meanings, its phrases, is qualified not only to be an American citizen but I should say he would be very well qualified for a seat upon this floor; because I think I have met Senators here who failed to recognize any difference between a bill of attainder and an attainder for treason. I think I have found here that Senators failed to recognize what was meant by an ex post facto law. I have seen here that Senators were defective in a great many respects so far as constitutional learning is concerned.

But the idea of setting up this mere mechanical art of writing a man's name and being able to read it as a standard, to me is mockery. Such an intelligence qualification as a general rule is a mockery. If you ask the radical side of this House to-day whether it is for want of intelligence that they complain of their opponents, they will tell you "No; those conservative fellows can read and write as well as anybody; some of them really are very learned men; some of them have grasped the whole range of the sciences; it is not because they cannot read and write; it is not because the avenues of knowledge are not open to them;" but what a party always complains of on the part of its opponents is that they are rascals; they intend to destroy the country, they intend to overturn its institutions, they intend to destroy liberty, and on the whole they are the very incarnation of concentrated diabolism! It is not because people do not know that they are supposed to be incapable of performing their duties as American citizens—I mean the mass of them—it is because they are supposed to be perverse, they are supposed to be malignant, they are supposed to be so far impregnated with that general malice which makes them oppose that which is a good thing if it comes from their opponents, just as I was encountered the other day in starting a very good thing. It was opposed by a great many persons because it came from me. That illustrates exactly the position of the great parties of the country. "No good thing can come out of Nazareth" was the old cry. We have a man in my town who is particularly obnoxious to some people; and they do not take any newspapers; they do not read anything about politics; but on the morning of the election they come into town and inquire how he is going to vote, and they vote on the other side. You see how cheap that is, how easy it is, how much it saves, how much of trouble and turmoil and difficulty and contention you get rid of by adopting some simple method of that kind when you come to determine whether you will support a particular project or not. There are other people that you know of, perhaps, and I, too, who use the same economical method of preparing themselves for political duties, but in a different form, by taking for instance some exceedingly intelligent gentleman as my friend from Iowa; and coming into town in the morning and asking, "How is Mr. GRIMES going to vote? Mr. GRIMES is a sound man, I am going to vote just as he votes."

All these methods are resorted to; but I believe that I have never yet encountered any difficulty upon the score of reading and writing, and particularly reading and writing a man's name, which, as it has been suggested, may be in a foreign language, may be in a language utterly unknown to anybody except the writer. If he chooses to say there is such a language as that in which he writes, how are you to determine it?

I feel constrained to vote against the qualification proposed by the honorable Senator from Connecticut. I do so moved by the considerations which I have stated. I do so more from a feeling of the utter insufficiency, the utter inadequacy of his qualification. If I had been consulted as to the proper safeguard to throw about this privilege which we are to grant to the colored citizens of this District, I would have desired another one, a very different one, and one for which I think there are more precedents even than for the one he has chosen to father and adopt; and that is that no person should be admitted to this privilege who had voluntarily given aid or encouragement to the recent rebellion. I think that would be proper, because I have learned—whether from authentic sources or not I cannot say, not being sufficiently acquainted to determine—that a great many colored people of this District really sympathized with the South in its late struggle for independence, and if they had any favors whatever to bestow would have given them in that direction, and that in many cases they really did. Whether they aided the discomfited confederate upon the same principle that they helped our prisoners and our unfortunate soldiers down South, I cannot say; but it is pretty clear that there are people of that class; and if the number is to be limited or qualified in any way I should think that much more proper than merely to set up this shadowy, unsubstantial, mechanical—because it has but very little of intellect about it—qualification of being able to read and write one's name. Therefore, Mr. President, with all deference to those who suppose they can fix some measure by which to gauge a man's patriotism, to gauge his virtue, to gauge his intelligence, I shall be obliged to vote against this proposition.

Mr. FOSTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Mr. President, I differ very widely from the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania in my estimate of reading and writing. The Senator from Pennsylvania agrees with the Senator from Delaware, who spoke yesterday almost sneeringly of reading and writing, thinking it was a very small affair, and that it had very little to do with qualifying a man for the exercise of the elective franchise or any intellectual or moral pursuit—

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me correct the honorable Senator.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, if I misrepresented him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. To the extent of reading and writing one's name. I spoke of that alone.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not so understand the honorable Senator. Of course I submit with great pleasure to the correction.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is what I meant.

Mr. FOSTER. That, however, is not and was not the proposition before the Senate. I was sorry also that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] expressed an opinion similar to the opinion expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Delaware in regard to reading and writing being a qualification for a voter. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, from the manner in which he treats this subject, I should think was now fresh from his reading of "Much Ado about Nothing," and was quoting Mr. Justice Dogberry, who, said I believe—the honorable Senator will correct me if I misquote, for he is very fresh in his readings of the English and other classics—"to be a well-favored man is the gift of fortune, but to read and write comes by nature." Like that very high authority, Mr. Justice Dogberry, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania and the honorable Senator from Delaware, and I am sorry to include in the same category the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, seem inclined to say—"away with writing and reading till there is need of such vanity."

Now, I agree that to be able simply to read and to write does not prove that a man has either the intellectual or moral qualifications necessary for a voter in the United States. But, sir, when I agree to that I must be permitted to lay it down as a proposition that the man who cannot read and who cannot write is in all human probability unqualified to perform the duties of an elector. The avenue to all the knowledge necessary to qualify one for that duty seems, under those circumstances, to be absolutely closed to him. It is possible, I agree, that a man who can neither read nor write may have sufficient intelligence to cast a vote; but such a case is exceptional; the great mass of mankind who can neither read nor write surely have not that intelligence which voters in this country ought to have and must have if our institutions are to be upheld and perpetuated.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken in supposing that this idea comes from what he calls, perhaps correctly, the "hub of the universe," Massachusetts. Massachusetts is certainly a most distinguished and renowned State; her people are intelligent and learned, but they did not discover the propriety or necessity of establishing as a test in their constitution the ability to read and write as a necessary qualification for their electors. Several years before Massachusetts incorporated such an article in her constitution the State of Connecticut had made reading a necessary test for the qualification of voters in that State. This was not in the ancient days which the Senator from Pennsylvania might take pleasure in characterizing as the "blue law" times, but at a later period, after our people had been enlightened by the intelligence of Pennsylvania. In the year 1855 the people of Connecticut adopted as an amendment to their constitution in substance the following:

"No person who cannot read any article of this constitution or any section of the laws of this State shall be admitted as an elector."

The State of Massachusetts copied that in substance two years after, in the year 1857. And, sir, I submit to the honorable Senators from Pennsylvania and Delaware and Massachusetts that it is in very bad taste to sneer at reading and writing as qualifications for voters. I was astonished to hear the honorable Senator from Massachusetts express the opinions he did on that subject. I cannot but think that the great majority of the intelligent—and most of the people of Massachusetts are highly intelligent—the great majority of the people of Massachusetts if the question were put to them to-day would say a man should not vote in that State who cannot read and write.

The State of Connecticut first adopted a constitution, having till that time lived under the charter of King Charles, in the year 1818. One of the qualifications of an elector in that constitution was that he should be a man of good moral character. There were various other qualifications. In 1845 an amendment was adopted enabling all white males twenty-one years of age and of good moral character to become electors. In Connecticut we have always made the possession of a good moral character a necessary qualification for an elector, and in 1855, as I have before stated, we added to that qualification, or rather we denied the privilege of an elector to any person who should thereafter apply who could not read any article of the constitution or any section of the statutes of the State.

Mr. President, I do not believe that that was going backward in human progress; on the contrary I believe it was going forward, and I believe the idea of admitting men to the elective franchise who can neither read nor write is going backward and downward. We all agree—at least I hear no one bold enough to deny it that intelligence and morality are at the basis of free institutions: On intelligence and morality, under God, all free Governments, all free institutions must rest. Why, then, are not intelligence and morality necessary attributes in those whom we admit to exercise and enjoy the elective franchise? Why sneer at reading and writing when almost all the knowledge which the world has thus far accumulated can be acquired now only by reading; I mean substantially all, of course not literally and absolutely. The knowledge of the past comes to us substantially through history, and history comes to us through the volumes which are stored in our libraries, and we acquire from them the wisdom of past ages. Now, where a man, no matter from what cause, cannot thus become acquainted, through books, by reading, with the wisdom of past ages, nor with the events and occurrences of the day, I say he is not and cannot be an intelligent, and is not therefore a safe voter.

I was astonished also to hear the honorable Senator from Massachusetts say that from 1789 to the present time we had suffered little from ignorance. The assertion was not indeed made, but the idea was pretty clearly expressed, that the evils we had encountered were rather chargeable to the intelligence of the people, that the late rebellion had been caused by intelligent, acute, well-informed men, and that the ignorant were disposed to support the flag of the Union and stand by the Government. I certainly differ from that honorable Senator most widely on that proposition.

It is true that many of the men who were active in inaugurating this rebellion were men of intelligence, men of culture, men of education, but most of them were ignorant of the real condition of this country, lamentably ignorant of the free States, ignorant of the stuff that the men inhabiting the free States were made of, and of the temper and capacity of those men to resist aggression. Had they not been thus ignorant they never would have incited this rebellion. Further than that, the great mass of the southern people who joined in the rebellion were not thus intelligent and educated; they were ignorant, grossly ignorant. The masses from the southern States, who made up the bulk of the armies in the field, were ignorant, unlettered men; many of them could neither read nor write. These were the men who furnished the support, the strength of the rebellion, the men who fought its battles, without whom it could not have lasted six months. Ignorance was the cause of the rebellion; ignorance sustained it; intelligence, morality, and patriotism overcame it. The honorable Senator would make up an issue between intelligence on the one side, and perhaps equal or greater intelligence on the other. That was not the true condition. It was, I repeat it, an issue between ignorance, ignorant men led on by men of disappointed ambition, wily demagogues, evil designing men, who can always impose upon the ignorant and lead them where they list, and true and loyal intelligent men. Thank God, the true and patriotic men of the country were numerous enough and strong enough to overcome in the struggle; but if reading and writing had not been more common in the northern and free States than in the southern States the rebellion would have triumphed, and we should not be sitting here to-day.

Mr. President would not occupy that chair, no Senator here would occupy a seat in this Chamber to-day if reading and writing had not been more universal through the northern and free States than in the southern and slave States. The ablest and most popular northern leaders could never have set on foot such a rebellion as this in the free States because the people were too intelligent to be thus imposed upon. I repeat it, I was astonished to hear the honorable Senator from Massachusetts intimate that ignorance had done little or no harm in this country. Ignorance connected with its handmaid, or rather with its twin sister depravity, has done all the harm; where you find ignorance you find depravity almost universally.

Now, sir, it must not be understood that I am not in favor of enlarged suffrage. I am. I lay it down as a proposition that the broader you can with safety make the basis of suffrage, the more stable, the more firm will be the foundation of your Government, and for the most obvious reasons.

If I am asked, "Would you let every person vote?" I reply, "Yes, I would let every person vote who is fit to vote." I voted yesterday to allow what is called female suffrage, not because, as I think, the great mass of the women of this country desire to vote. I know, on the contrary, that within the circle of my acquaintance and observation the great mass of them do not desire to vote; but that is not the question. I should not be disposed to grant to a class of persons the right to vote simply because they desired it. The desire to do a thing or to occupy a position, however strong that desire may be, is not always the best evidence of the necessary qualifications. We may desire to do many things for which we are unfit, and we may be unwilling to perform many duties for which we are eminently fit. I voted for female suffrage because in principle I can see no reason for denying the right to every person who is fit to vote. Of course it makes a Government strong to enlarge the basis of suffrage as far as you can with safety, for you thus bring every person, so to speak, into the Government; it makes every person an integral part of the Government; every person feels that to some extent it is his Government, and his interest and his duty will therefore be to protect, support, defend the Government, because it is his, and because he is a constituent part of it. Such a Government will have elements of strength and perpetuity which no other Government on the earth can have. A Government which does not thus grant the elective franchise to all its people who are fit to exercise the right cannot be so strong as one which does. The persons who are left out make an element of weakness. They may not be hostile to the Government, but in time of emergency and great peril it would, in my apprehension, be safer to subtract this power from the sum total of the power of the body-politic than it would be to add it to that sum total.

But, Mr. President, while I am thus in favor of this enlarged suffrage without reference to race or color or sex, I am not in favor of allowing ignorant, grossly ignorant men, the mass of whom because of their ignorance will also be criminal, to exercise the right of suffrage. I believe it cannot be done with safety.

It is not strange, sir, that there should be diverse opinions on this subject. While some argue for extending this privilege to all classes, all sexes, all colors, making perhaps the attainment of a certain age the only qualification, others would restrict it to the male sex of one race, others would restrict it with certain qualifications of intelligence and morals. I am one of those who, while I go for the largest extension, would have a qualification of intelligence and morals, and have that an essential qualification, and I do not believe that the interests of society will be safe unless you apply some test as a qualification for your voters.

I would ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, whether if he were a member of the State Legislature at home, as he often has been, he would vote for a Senator in this body who could neither read nor write. He may say that such a contingency is not probable. I agree that it is not, but it is possible. It is possible that such a man may be a candidate for the Senate from the State of Massachusetts; that is, it would be possible if it were not for the qualification she requires. He is for abolishing the qualification; and in that state of things a man might be a candidate for the Senate from Massachusetts who could neither read nor write. I must take leave to presume, in the absence of the honorable Senator's denying the assertion, that he would not vote for a man to represent his State in this body who could neither read nor write. I take it I have his assent to that proposition. I take it he would not vote in this body to confirm a man as a judge or as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court who could neither read nor write. I trust I may assume that no member of this body, not even the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, or the honorable Senator from Delaware, would vote to confirm a man as a judge or as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court who could neither read nor write. I trust not. I believe not. And why not? Because they would say it is impossible that a man who can neither read nor write should be qualified to discharge his duties in this body or his duties on the bench of the Supreme Court.

There would I take it be great unanimity of opinion on that question. If that be granted, I would ask these same gentlemen whether they would vote to constitute a tribunal, if there were such a one known to our Constitution, or if such a one should be created, higher than the Supreme Court, higher than the Senate, higher than Congress whose duty it should be to revise the proceedings of the Supreme Court, the proceedings of Congress, and correct whatever errors they found in the administration of those two tribunals. Of course they would say that they would not vote for men to sit in that tribunal who could neither read nor write; for surely they would not call upon men who could neither read nor write to correct the errors of men who could read and write, and to fill whose places they would not permit men who could not read and write to sit.

Now, Mr. President, I understand all these gentlemen to be prepared to vote to allow men who can neither read nor write to vote at the ballot-boxes. And what are the ballot-boxes, and who are the men who come forward to deposit their ballots in the ballot-boxes? They are the people of this country to whom all questions must ultimately go for examination and correction. Every act of Congress may under certain circumstances come before the Supreme Court for construction as to its constitutionality. The Supreme Court, if they set it aside on the ground of its unconstitutionality, in one sense annul the law; but all of us of course are subject at all times to error. The Senate and every tribunal is fallible; and the Supreme Court being fallible, are liable to make mistakes, and where are their mistakes corrected? They are corrected at the ballot-box and they can be corrected only at the ballot-box; not directly I agree; a decision of the Supreme Court is not directly reversed at the ballot-box. I do not claim that; but if the Supreme Court make a decision which the people of this country, a majority, think to be unsound and wrong they will take a course which will reverse that decision. It will take some time to do it, but it will certainly be done. If an act of Congress perfectly constitutional is in the judgment of the people an unwise and impolitic and injurious law the people will take measures at a very early day to have that law repealed, and it will be done. It will be done through the people acting at the ballot-boxes. They correct the mistakes which we make and which Congress makes and which the Supreme Court makes. The electors at the ballot-boxes are the grand court of errors for the country. Now, sir, these Senators propose to allow men who cannot read and write to correct our mistakes, to become members of this high court of errors. It seems to me I confess little short of an absurdity to say that while men ought not to sit in Congress, ought not to sit in the Supreme Court who can neither read nor write, we will put it in the power of men who can neither read nor write to correct their errors, rectify their mistakes. How far short of an absurdity is it? This is suffrage without intelligence, without morality.

Mr. President, I am not prepared for that. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts says he wants to put the ballot into the hands of the black man for his protection. If he cannot read the ballot, what kind of protection is it to him? A written or printed slip of paper is put into the hands of a man, black or white, and if he cannot read it, what is it to him. What does he know about it? What can he do with it? How can he protect himself by it? As well might the honorable Senator from Massachusetts put in the hands of a child who knew nothing of firearms a loaded pistol with which to protect himself against his enemies. The illustration is by no means wanting in its force in various respects. The child would be much more likely to endanger himself and his friends by the pistol than to protect himself. A perfectly ignorant man who cannot read his ballot is much more likely to use it to his own detriment and to the detriment of the country than he is to use it for the benefit of either. It seems to me ridiculous to talk about putting the ballot into the hands of a man who, when he has got it, cannot determine the character of it. Whether he proposes to vote for one man or another; whether he proposes to vote yea or nay on any question, the ballot does not inform him. Is there any protection in that?

I submit, sir, that on general principles without intelligence there can be no safety in allowing people to vote; there can be no safety in ignorant suffrage. I know that the honorable Senator and other gentlemen here make an appeal in regard to the blacks of the country because as it is said, and truly said, they have for a long period of time been held under oppression; it has been a criminal offense for them to learn to read; and now to make reading or writing or both a qualification of suffrage is adding insult to injury. I do not so understand it. I do not understand that because we have been doing a cruel wrong and injustice to these people for centuries we are thereby bound to give them privileges which will not inure to their benefit, and which will be dangerous to society. Did I not believe they would be thus dangerous I should vote most cheerfully to give every man of them the right of suffrage. I do believe that the principle is unsound, unsafe, dangerous in a free community, and I cannot vote for it.

It is intimated that the freedmen will vote right on questions now pending before the country. They, as it is asserted, know enough to know their friends, and they will vote right. That means, I suppose, that at the present time these men would cast ballots such as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and I would cast at the same time, if we were authorized to vote at the same place; and it means that men like him and others in whom these people might have confidence would put ballots into the hands of those of them who cannot read, and tell them what the character of those ballots was, in order that they might deposit them in the ballot-boxes and have the benefit of their votes. So far as the results are concerned at once and immediately it might be well; but when we are making a law in regard to suffrage we are not taking the part of men who are electioneering for a particular canvass; we are making a law which should have in it wisdom, which should have in it strength, and which is entitled, at least so far as we can judge, to remain perpetually on our statute-book. In that state of things, I say, and I think history verifies the assertion, that it would be entirely unsafe to give to men whom we can influence to do right now a power which years, and possibly ages, after will be in the same hands, during all which time they will be subject to evil influences, and far more likely to do wrong than to do right.

As to the question of hardship to the blacks, it is greatly overestimated; many of them can read now, those who cannot will soon learn, and the right to vote is a healthy stimulus to them to acquire knowledge; very few will be excluded by this test in two years' time. I cannot regard it so certain as gentlemen seem to do that these people will be sure to vote on the right side. How long will it be before these men forgetting the wrongs, injuries, and cruelties that have been practiced upon them in the state of slavery to which they have been subjected will be forming new relations, new ties, new friendships? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts even anticipates that it will be a very early day, for he says with a significance which perhaps will astonish himself when he comes to contemplate the full bearings of it, that the moment these men have the ballot those who formerly oppressed and tyrannized over them will be courting their friendship and treating them kindly. If that should happen, what would be the result? There would be the tie of friendship, of kindly influence immediately arising between those who had at a very late period been in this relation of antagonism. The honorable Senator repeated more than once "they know enough to know their friends." The African race, I believe, is peculiarly susceptible to the feeling of gratitude; they remember benefits; and if their former masters, even those who have been cruel to them, come forward and treat them with kindness, with friendship, with justice, with generosity, they will be drawn to those masters by a tie stronger than any extending from South Carolina to Massachusetts, and one that will be much more efficient and much more practicable. The very men who are now yielding to right influences and who will vote with those who are voting right will be led, I fear, to vote wrong, and will be giving strength and irresistible strength to a power against which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has been warring for many years of his active and useful life, southern aristocracy. Now, if the ballot is put in the hands of these men at this time he will find it necessary within a few years to war with this same power hereafter; I fear to his dying day, which I hope will be very remote.

Though men who are ignorant and uninformed may for a time be influenced on the right side of a question, yet as a general rule those men will be influenced most easily and most certainly to go on the wrong side. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts cannot play the wily demagogue, the evil-designing man. There are men in this country who can, and the men who can will dupe the ignorant. Ignorant men are always tools and instruments in the hands of the ambitious, the unprincipled, the unscrupulous. They are a potent element of strength in the hands of such men, and can be used for the most mischievous and dangerous purposes. You increase the power of such men indefinitely when you grant the elective franchise to persons ignorant, simple, credulous, grateful for kindness, ready to bestow their confidence where they receive kindness, and ready to be led in any direction by men to whom they give their confidence. In this struggle for influence the Senator from Massachusetts and those who act with him—and it is my pleasure and my pride almost always to act with him—will find themselves beaten, overcome to a certainty. I repeat we are not making a law for one year or for two years, but we are making a law which we ought to consider perpetual; a rule for voters not merely in this District, but one which would be safe and salutary if adopted throughout the United States.

Under these circumstances I support the amendment proposed by my colleague to the amendment reported by the committee. I wish it were somewhat stronger, but it is better than no qualification. If it shall be adopted I shall then move, if no other Senator does, an amendment declaring that this provision shall not apply to men who have borne arms for the country during this rebellion. I would give such men the right to vote, even though they could neither read nor write. I think, under those circumstances, we should break the rule, first, because it would be but just to do so, and in the next place, the number would not be large enough to exercise a controlling influence. While I do not agree to the doctrine that the ballot and the bayonet necessarily must go together, for, as the honorable Senator from Missouri showed us conclusively yesterday, and as others have showed, there is no connection between them; yet where men have borne arms for the Government in this rebellion I would give them the right to vote, even though they were illiterate.

If, Mr. President, I need any excuse for supporting this amendment, I beg leave to refer again to the constitution of my State, not, of course, binding on me as a representative of that State here, but still a light to guide me in my actions to a certain extent. We all, as I trust, respect the constitution and laws of our own State, and unless we assume to be wiser than those who made the constitution of our State and who make its laws the principles of that constitution and of those laws will have their proper influence upon our action in this body. As I have said, Connecticut has this article in her constitution, superadding to it the qualification of a good moral character. I would be glad if that, too, could be adopted here; but it would be hardly practicable to carry that into effect, although in my own State it has been a test of qualification from the earliest times. While I by no means claim that every elector in that State is a man of good moral character, I still think that provision of the constitution has been and is a wholesome and salutary one. It has had an effect on young men coming forward to be qualified as freemen of the State. The fact that when they presented themselves before the board where every man takes what we call the freeman's oath before he is admitted as an elector, the fact that a man knows that the question of his moral character will come up and may be examined, has had a salutary effect, not that it makes every man moral, for we have our bad men as well as other States.

Mr. MORRILL. If my honorable friend will allow me, I wish to ask him whether he finds it practicable in the actual administration of affairs to carry out that provision? Are men in that State interrogated and excluded for want of morality?

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to the honorable Senator, I will state that I have heard the question asked before the board repeatedly, whether the applicant was a man of good moral character. The question is not universally asked, but I have known testimony to be taken up on the subject. The provision is not a dead letter in our constitution, although I repeat we do admit men unfortunately who are not really fit men, as we break the Maine law, which we derive from the honorable Senator's State. It is against the law of our State to sell intoxicating beverages; but I admit, and I regret to admit, that the law is broken, shamefully broken; but still I believe it exercises a valuable restraint in many sections of the State.

My honorable friend on my right [Mr. Cresswell] asks how it is as to men who become immoral, vicious, after they once have been admitted to the list of voters. In regard to them, I may say that unless convicted by a court of a crime which makes them infamous, they are not excluded. The tribunal which admits electors and administers the freeman's oath is not empowered to try the question of a man's good moral character after he has once been admitted. That can only be passed upon by a court. If he is convicted of an offense for which an infamous punishment is affixed, he is then disqualified and can no longer vote.

I say then, Mr. President, that if I needed any apology, which I do not, for insisting upon intelligence and morality as a qualification for voters, I should have the example of my own State; which I always take pride in quoting, to sustain my action. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, it seems, was in 1857 opposed to the adoption of this test by his State. But when the State of Connecticut as late as 1855, and the State of Massachusetts as late as 1857, have made this a test for the qualification of voters in those several Commonwealths, I do think that I, at least, am called upon to sustain a qualification such as we here propose to this bill. With that I can cheerfully give the bill my support; without it, I confess I shall not be able to vote for the bill.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I am very sorry the honorable Senator from Connecticut has not been able to agree with me on this subject, for certainly there is no member of this body for whose opinions at all times I entertain higher respect, and none with whom when I agree I feel so well assured of being right. I am also pleased, on the other hand, that what I may have said has induced that honorable Senator to give his views upon this point. If I have one thing to suggest to my brethren above all others, which I would wish to impress upon them, it is that they ponder well the speech to which they have just listened. The honorable Senator from Connecticut has depicted the consequences of the introducing to this great privilege, the ballot, of large masses of ignorant people. He has shown the consequences which have heretofore happened to the country from allowing such classes of people to exercise the franchise. He has told you, Mr. President, that to this the late rebellion has been owing. He has told you that it is attributed to the fact that the masses of the southern people were so entirely ignorant that they were to be led away into rebellion by ambitious leaders, and that thus were brought upon the country such perils as it has recently undergone.

If that be true, if such consequences follow from conferring the elective franchise on people of this character, is it not the plainest proposition imaginable that if you undertake to set up any barrier, that if you undertake to correct the evil which you anticipate, if you undertake to guard against that which you say has happened, and which will most likely happen again, your barrier ought to be effective, it ought to be that which would restrain, that which would keep back and limit. There is where I differ with the honorable Senator from Connecticut. He says that to provide that the voter shall read and write his own name is such a barrier, that with that we may be secure; that if, for instance the confederate in grey had been universally able to read and write his name therefore we should have had no rebellion, therefore John C. Calhoun would have had no followers, the doctrine of nullification would have had no advocates, the doctrine of secession would have had no disciples, the doctrine of primary State allegiance would have had no argument.

Mr. President, I have very great and very grave doubts about all these things. The conclusion he arrives at is to me a non sequitur. Whether the southern masses could read and write their names, or whether they could read and write generally, and whether they were intelligent generally, I am by no means prepared to say that all these things would not have happened, perhaps happened in greater intensity than they have happened. I am not so certain that all these doctrines, pernicious as they have been, plausible as they were, fortified as they were by argument, by logic, and by, perhaps, the highest form of skill and learning in statesmanship, would not have been worse if the constituency had been as intelligent as that of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. But, sir, when he proposes here to vote for a bill to give the right of suffrage to men far lower even than the confederate masses, men who had condescended to be the slaves and the servants for hundreds of years of that same people; when he proposes to confer the right of suffrage upon them, and to expose us to all the dangers which he alleges are sure to follow this kind of ignorant constituency—I say, when he proposes to do that, and then has set up this barrier of being able to read and write a man's own name as a sufficient protection, I cannot agree to it.

Mr. WILLEY. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLEY. If I understand the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania's remarks correctly, I certainly misunderstand the amendment which is pending. Does the honorable Senator say it only requires that the voter shall be able to write his name and read it?

Mr. COWAN. That is my point.

Mr. WILLEY. I understand the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania to argue as if this amendment confined the test simply to the qualification of being able to write the man's name and read it simply.

Mr. COWAN. That is it.

Mr. WILLEY. I understand the amendment to include the qualification of reading generally, and also of writing his name; two tests, one the reading generally and the other the writing his own name. Certainly if the proper interpretation of this amendment is as the Senator from Pennsylvania construes it it amounts to nothing.

Mr. COWAN. That is the way I construe it; and I suppose as this is to be a law, it is to have that legal precision which will make it effective. In making a law, and particularly a law which is calculated to limit the highest of man's rights, as this is supposed to be, there ought to be that certainty and that precision about it which would enable the test to be applied. If it is to be reading generally, what is the man to read? Is he to read the First, Second, Third, or Fourth Eclectic Reader? Is he to read the acts of Congress, or is he to read the New Testament? Is he to read the confession of faith, or the Constitution of the country? What is he to read? How much is he to read? Who is to determine what he can read, and the amount of it? And as I before remarked, shall he understand as he reads, or is he merely to read as a parrot might be taught to read or as an idiot might be and has been taught to read? I suppose that if truly a test at all, it was to be a legal, practical test which would satisfy legal and practical men. Who shall determine this thing? Is it to be the judge of the election? The judge of the election, according to the theory, may not be able to read, because there is no provision to deprive other electors and other people eligible to this office of judge who are not able to read. Then you would have the most extraordinary spectacle presented in the capital of the nation, here in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, of having a board of three election judges no one of whom could read or write his own name or read or write anything else, to determine the qualifications of one of this new batch of voters who are to be admitted on qualifications, one of which it is not possible for these judges to judge of!

Think of it! It is one of the difficulties which will have to be encountered. It is perfectly immaterial to me whether you take it one way or the other. If you confine the construction as I have done to the simple fact that he shall be able to read and write his own name, then I say to my honorable friend with all due deference, this is no barrier at all; this is a mockery in the name of a barrier; this is an insult to those who expect barriers. What! a barrier which can be surmounted in twenty-four hours, because I venture to say that with the acknowledged imitative ability of the African (and he has that unquestionably in the highest degree) he may be taught in twenty-four hours not only to write his own name legibly, but afterward to read it, recognize it as he would recognize his own mark. Take that to be his qualification if you please; take that to be the test, and I say it is a mockery, worse than a mockery, it is a barrier inadequate when the want of an adequate one is acknowledged.

But if you please take it in its broader sense, as the honorable Senator from West Virginia understands it; then I ask where is its precision, where is it to begin and where is it to end, and who shall determine its limits? I tremble for my sable brother when I reflect that he may be at the mercy of some political board in this respect. I beg my friends here to observe that this sable gentleman may not be quite so certain, as they fancy he is, on their side. Now, I will put the case of a board belonging to the dominant party, and suppose they have the statute amended by my honorable friend from Connecticut before them; and a colored man comes forward and proposes to vote. They put to him the question "Can you write your name and read?" "Oh yes," "Well, let us see you try it." He then writes his name and he reads it and he is admitted if he is understood to belong to that party. But suppose, as has recently happened, that this dark man should come to the conclusion to vote on the other side, and it were known that he meant to vote on the other side, what kind of a chance would he have? Then the man of the dominant party who desires to carry the election says, "You shall not only write your name and read it, but you must read generally; I have read the senatorial debates upon this question, and the honorable Senator from West Virginia who originated this amendment was of opinion that a man should read generally. Now, sir, read generally if you please." "Well," says he, "what shall I read?" Read a section of the Novum Organum or some other most difficult and abstruse thing, or a few sections from Oken's Physiology would be delightful. [Laughter.]

Is this to be an engine? Instead of being a test for the true voter, and instead of being that which will enable us to detect the American citizen even under this sable garb, is it to be a snare and pitfall in the poor man's way? Is it to be made the instrument in the hands of cunning politicians and corrupt election boards to permit the law that we now make in such tribulation for their benefit to be annulled and made void, or to minister merely to the will of a party? Certainly my honorable friend from Connecticut would not say that. I understand him to say that a barrier is needed; that a barrier is needed against every ignorant population, every population which has not enjoyed the advantages of education, which have made that little yellow spot in the map called Connecticut, as De Tocqueville once demonstrated, such a remarkable place.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut, when ignorant populations of this kind are to be admitted to franchises of this sort, admits that there is very great danger. The fact is there is the greatest danger in the world. And, as I said before, I have no doubt that he desires, if there be a barrier at all, that that be an effective barrier. That this should be considered a barrier in the State of Connecticut, that it should be found to work well in the State of Connecticut, I have no doubt. In the first place, I think the State of Connecticut would work just as well without the barrier. I would not be afraid of such a population as the State of Connecticut has if there was not a barrier in the world. I believe, too, the people of the State of Connecticut (and I do not desire it to be taken in any very high complimentary phrase) could get along very well if they had no constitution whatever. If they were allowed to go, as Dogberry said, simply by the light of nature, reason; if they were to take the gifts which they have from nature alone without education, I think they could get along. But you set up such a barrier as that they should be able to make a wooden clock and to understand its mechanism, there might have been some force in the thing. I am sorry that I was guilty of such a want of knowledge of the origin of this test as to attempt in any way to deprive Connecticut of the honor of it. I really supposed it belonged to the State of Massachusetts, although I cannot say that I had examined it carefully before.

But, Mr. President, with all deference to Connecticut and her ability in restraining ignorant masses by means of this kind, I have to say that it is only about equal to another test that I heard they had applied a good while ago for another purpose, and that was an ancient enactment of that State, that no girl should get married until she could bake a doughnut that would preserve its twist for a year. [Laughter].

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator is mistaken; that was a Pennsylvania law, there was no such law in Connecticut. [Laughter].

Mr. COWAN. Well, I may be misinformed there, because really I have not read Brant for a long while; it may have originated in Pennsylvania; but it has not been applied since my knowledge of the State commenced. I am very well satisfied that girls can get married there and do get married there every day, I am sure, without being able to bake a doughnut at all. [Laughter].

Here is the difference: I insist that this barrier is no barrier; I insist that this test is no test, that it is no limitation whatever, that the virtue and intelligence of those classes which are entitled to the franchise are not to be measured in this way at all. They must be measured by the great good sense of the community. The community in which a man lives is to determine it. The question of suffrage, in other words, belongs to the States. When the community of Massachusetts determines that her negroes shall have a vote the same as white people, that is a just, righteous, legal determination of that question. She has the right to make it, and it is an appeal to the good sense of Massachusetts to make it. So when the same question comes before Pennsylvania, which has ten or fifteen times as many negroes as Massachusetts has, and Pennsylvania decides that this class of the community shall not vote, that is equally just, equally righteous, and equally legal in my judgment. And so it is everywhere else.

Now, the question is before the Senate to decide for this community, the people of the District of Columbia; and the first question, and one which I think is important, is, is it safe? It has been admitted by the honorable Senator from Connecticut that there is danger in admitting this class. The man who undertakes to limit and to restrain it admits that danger. If there be danger then I argue that all the rest of us have a right to insist upon it that the barrier proposed shall be effective to protect against that danger.

The danger admitted, the next question is as to the efficacy of the barrier against that danger.

Just in proportion to the magnitude of the danger, just in the same proportion must be the efficacy of that which you set up in order to prevent its happening.

Now, what is the danger? The danger is that which we have encountered, the danger of another rebellion, the danger that by conferring ballots upon these men you furnish food for demagogues, you furnish the material upon which they live and upon which they run riot, by which and through which they have destroyed heretofore governments and communities. That is the danger and the danger depicted by the honorable Senator from Connecticut in terms much more exact and much more expressive than I could use. That is a great danger. That is the worst of all possible dangers. That is a danger that nobody heretofore apprehended from an admission of the white race to this privilege even in its widest latitude. Then I say if that be the character of the danger, as wise men here, feeling our responsibilities, acting as we do for the nation, we should oppose to it such safeguards as will at least protect against the danger we anticipate, the danger we know of, the danger we have been warned of as the honorable Senator has warned us.

I was rather surprised to hear the honorable Senator say that he would confer without any test and without any limit the right of suffrage upon those who had borne arms for their country. I have a very high respect for the soldier. I think that courage is the highest quality of man. I am so certain after all is said and done, but that the patriotic soldier, brave, exposing himself for his people and for his Government is the highest spectacle on the earth. But what connection is there between bearing arms and casting ballots? Have we forgotten the lessons of the past? Have we forgotten the fact that while one soldier is patriotic and brave and well deserving of the country, another is really mercenary? Have we forgotten the fact that it was the soldiery that overthrew republican Rome? Have you forgotten the fact that the Pretorian Guards were soldiers?

Mr. President, the same kind of discrimination must be made with regard to soldiers that is made with regard to other men. I am free to say that I would award the highest meed of praise as I would give the highest pension and the highest pay to the soldier; but when a man asks me to make that the measure of his capacity to fulfill the duties of a citizen, I have a right to say to him that the evidence is not conclusive. He may be a very good soldier and a very bad citizen; and a man may be a very good citizen and yet make a very bad soldier. The evidence must in some way connect itself with the qualifications necessary to perform the function; and in so far this as far as it goes is well enough. But the difficulty is that if you depart from the strictly legal construction of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Connecticut you are at sea, you have no guide; you are at the mercy of the corruptions of factions, their disregard of all law in the heat of contest, and your barrier or test becomes utterly and totally useless.

Mr. President, I have said thus much on this point because I thought it necessary that I should say it. I have no faith whatever in these tests. If there is danger in front, that danger must be met and must be counteracted by something entirely different from this kind of flimsy bulwark.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, having a day or two ago made a few remarks on this bill, and having so recently taken my place in the Senate, my sense of propriety and my inclination both suggest that I remain silent; and yet the importance of the measure leads me to express my views. But before considering the specific point that has been under discussion this morning, I have a remark or two to make in reply to several objections that have been made to the measure.

A distinguished lawyer and Senator has stated before the country that he cannot vote for this bill because it is unconstitutional in that it is ex post facto in its character, imposing a severer punishment on the crime of treason or giving aid and comfort to the rebellion than existed at the time the offense was committed. Mr. President, there is a clear distinction, as was stated by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL] between absolute rights and conventional rights. Except for crime this nation cannot take from me my life; not if by doing so the whole debt of the nation could be paid. If the nation did it, the nation would be a murderer. My life must run the mission that God intended it, and until God recalls it. But surely a Legislature can take away the right to fill an office at thirty years of age, and say it shall not be filled till thirty-five, or the right to vote at twenty-one, and say it shall not be exercised till thirty-one, or, where the conventional right is not secured by the Constitution, can take away the right entirely.

But the argument is that this law is unconstitutional and ex post facto, because the right to vote is taken from those who gave aid and comfort to the enemy, as a punishment. That is begging the question. The law does not say so, and it is not for that purpose that the Senate vote for it. I believe I express the sentiment of this Senate when I say that they would be perfectly willing to give the right to vote, not to a repentant, for that term is offensive as between men, but to a reformed rebel. It is in that spirit that the proviso is appended to the admirable constitutional amendment which has been adopted by the loyal States. The reason that one who has given aid and comfort to the enemy is not permitted to vote, is because he has not the qualification of loyalty, a qualification which this nation has a right to insist on all over the land.

There is magnanimity in the people of the North, and they would be ready to extend to the South free forgiveness as soon as it manifested that quality of loyalty which this very law contemplates and for want of which this disqualification is annexed. But the people of the South should remember that the people of the loyal States are inexorably in earnest. They are radical, but their radical sentiment consists only in the fixed determination to eradicate every root and branch of disloyalty and of human slavery; and the very first minute the South will accept and meet them on these terms and join them in this purpose, the whole difficulty in this country will be at an end.

But to return to the specific question: even if the disqualification annexed to those who gave aid and comfort to the enemy is inflicted in this law as a punishment, is it ex post facto in any sense? When this crime was committed, by the laws of this country, by a statute signed by Washington on the 30th of April, 1790, the person who gave aid and comfort to the enemy became civilly dead; and what is civil death but a deprivation of every privilege—the privilege of holding office, the privilege of voting? Besides, the persons alluded to in this bill have voluntarily surrendered the right to vote by dissolving their allegiance with this Government and giving their allegiance to another so-called government. Therefore, Mr. President, I think there is no difficulty, and need be none, on any man's conscience in voting for this bill on any such constitutional ground.

Another objection I have heard urged here, and that is that this is a white man's Government. I admit that de facto this is a white man's Government; but that it is so de jure I think it would be difficult to establish. Who can put his finger on the provision of the Constitution which makes it so? I think it will be very difficult to prove that a Mongolian or an Ethiopian has not rights under this Government. Practically, it is a white man's Government; and it seems to me that those gentlemen who urge that fact against the passage of this bill show very little confidence in the energy and courage and ability of the Anglo-Saxon race. I do not expect to be seized with that apprehension that this Government will cease to be a white man's Government until I change my complexion.

But then, it is said we are going to give suffrage to an inferior race. That I do not argue. Be it so that they are an inferior race; that is only an additional reason why every true white man should do all in his power to incite them to energy and give them every aid to their elevation. Why, sir, the oracles of God have been appealed to here repeatedly, and we have been told that it was prophesied that cursed should be Canaan, and servant of servants should be he. If we are to justify our conduct by undertaking to show that we are fulfilling prophecy, then Judas and Pilate and the Roman soldiery cannot only prove their innocence, but can prove themselves entitled to immortal honor for the murder that they did on Calvary, for that act brought to this dark world the only ray of true light that has ever broken upon it. It seems to me, sir, that if we are going on a crusade to fulfill prophecy, we had better accelerate the fulfillment of that other prophecy which is about to be accomplished, that Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hands unto God.

Another objection that is made is, that by giving these colored people the right to vote we are inducing distasteful associations between races. What possible connection is there between the right to vote and the social associations and intimacies of life? That is the echo of an old prejudice that never had any foundation. Is any gentleman obliged or bound to associate with me because I vote any more than because I work, or write, or walk? It is the same kind of logic which is used where one said that he who drives fat oxen must therefore himself be fat. There is no possible connection of cause and effect between the two circumstances.

It is objected that this question of negro suffrage has never been submitted to the people. That is strictly true; it never has been directly submitted to the people; but is it usual before legislative action is had in reference to this ten miles square to submit the question of legislation to the people of America? The question has been before the people, and the testimony is very uniform from all parts of the nation that they are opposed to the irrational qualification of complexion in determining whether one shall perform an act of judgment. The people believe that as the test of complexion is not applied to the burdens, so it should not be applied to the privileges of Government. The people believe that with the toga of the citizen comes the armor of citizenship. The people believe that if you take from the French or the German or the Irish the ballot, they would be treated with disrespect and would be made the victims of oppression and of imposture.

But, sir, the soldiers of this country, not mercenary soldiers, the patriot soldiers of this country have done much toward enlightening society. They have seen these colored citizens in the same ranks with themselves; they have seen their manhood; they have shared their rations; they have been taught by them how to avoid the scent of the bloodhounds. These soldiers have seen these colored men lying in columns on the field of battle with their faces upturned to Heaven mutely pleading, as has been said, for the rights of their race; and they have done a missionary work among the people of this country.

But, Mr. President, that is not the whole of this case. While the people of this country are much interested in having the right of suffrage extended, they want to avoid ignorance in the elective franchise. The people of this country believe that human slavery is a great curse. They have been taught it from this Capitol. They have been taught it in strains of eloquence from the lips of those who will ever be associated with the cause of human freedom. They believe it is a great evil. They have been taught it on the field of battle and by the vacant places at their own hearth-stones. The two evils which they see in slavery are, the arrogance of the master and the ignorance of the slave. They would be most happy to secure this franchise, and be most happy on the other hand to avoid the introduction of any greater degree of ignorance in the elective franchise, and I believe that is just the reason why the people of this country have with such unanimity adopted the admirable constitutional amendment. It is because they see that by that provision which makes the ratio of representation to depend upon voters rather than upon inhabitants, the disloyal States will be constrained by State action, and as fast probably as the films and scales of ignorance incident to slavery fall away, to give suffrage to the negroes.

But we have got to determine the question now, whether we will give the right of suffrage or not, and with what qualifications. I confess that I have listened to the debate on this question of a reading qualification with great interest. There are clearly two sides to it. The argument in favor of insisting upon the ability-to-read test is that making the prize of the ballots contingent upon the ability to read would be a powerful stimulus to induce the colored citizen to learn to read. His pride, his shame, his ambition, his fear of degradation would all urge him to learn to read. But, sir, there is another side to the question; and it seems to me, when we consider all the difficulties there are in applying this reading test, that the argument is in favor of universal suffrage. The argument in favor of making the right to vote universal is that the ballot itself is a great education; that by its encouraging the citizen, by its inspiring him, it adds dignity to his character and makes him strive to acquire learning; secondly, that if the voting depended on learning, no inducement is extended to communities unfavorable to the right of voting in the colored man to give him the opportunity to learn; they would rather embarrass him to prevent his making the acquisition unless they were in favor of his voting, while if voting is universal, communities, for their own security, for their own protection, will be driven to establish common schools so that the voter shall become intelligent. I suppose that in the northern States the universality of the elective franchise has had much to do with the vigorous and extended common school systems which there exist. Besides, from the peculiar structure of society in this country, and in view of the possible necessity of resorting to measures of this nature to secure a loyal constituency elsewhere, I believe, that the true way to try the experiment here is to make it universal. I hope, I trust, I believe, that the experiment will be successful. I believe that communities will then go to work to give education to these men, and that they, feeling their manhood, will be animated to greater application and industry.

If this should be so, what results would we behold from this rebellion? We would see these people able to read, having the rights of citizens; then comes the newspaper; then comes the open Bible; and as the result of this rebellion we would see the mother of infamies dethroned and intelligence and virtue, twin sisters heaven-born, enthroned in her stead. Then we would see a teeming population all over this continent intelligent and virtuous, fit to exercise the rights and privileges of citizens. We would see this country extending on the one hand to Europe with its telegraph, and on the other to Asia with its railroads and its steamer connections, so that the influence of this country would be felt all over the world; the pulsations of the great American heart would vibrate intelligence and virtue and freedom to all the earth. I believe that this action which is being taken in this District is the beginning of great things. I admit that the question is a nice one to solve, whether the intelligence qualification shall be insisted on or not; but in view of all the case and all the circumstances of the country, I shall be constrained to try the experiment here, so far as my vote is concerned, by making the elective franchise universal.

MR. WILSON. Mr. President, I am always glad to hear the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] for he states his views with great clearness, precision, accuracy, and candor; but certainly I regret that he should have felt it his duty to advocate this amendment. I say to him frankly that while I am opposed to it, while I am opposed, in the present condition of the country at any rate, to making reading and writing a test, I believe that reading and writing do aid in qualifying men to discharge the duties that belong to citizens of the United States at the ballot-box. In opposing this amendment, I cannot consent to be put in that class of men who do not believe that reading and writing are qualifications for the duties of a citizen of the United States.

Let the Senator see the exact position in which the colored man in this District will be placed if this amendment should prevail. If he is allowed the right of suffrage without this condition, the cause of education will be advocated by the negro himself, by this whole community, because it will fit him to exercise more intelligently the great duty imposed upon him. If you put this qualification upon him, the bitter hostility to the education of the colored race that has distinguished this city and the government of this city; which has led the government of this city even to violate the express laws of Congress within the last two years, will be intensified and increased. The enemies of the colored man may not do here what they are doing in Maryland, in Virginia, in all the rebel States, burn down the school houses for the freedmen; they may not be strong enough to do that here; but they will do nothing to erect school-houses for the education of the freedman; they will do nothing to encourage his education. These thousands that went to the ballot-box last year and voted with so much unanimity against extending the right of suffrage to the colored people of this District, finding that we will only allow the colored men who can read and write to vote, will see to it that as few colored men shall be qualified as possible. They kept the colored man in ignorance to keep him in slavery; they will continue to keep him in ignorance to prevent his becoming a voter.

I regard this amendment as a proposition against school-houses for the education of the colored men of this District; if not to tear down the school-houses for the education of the black man, it is to prevent the erection of the school-house for the education of the black man. Who is to pass upon this qualification of reading and writing? The man who has voted that the black man shall not vote at all? It is proposed here in Congress to allow the man who has voted that the black man shall not vote at all to say whether he can read and write well enough to vote. How many of them will be permitted to vote? Possibly there might be a few negroes fit to fill seats in Congress or to sit upon the bench of the Supreme Court who might be permitted to vote. But few, very few of them would be permitted to vote under this amendment. You put it in the power of the enemies of this race to keep them from the ballot-box. By this provision we put the black men at the mercy of his avowed enemies. But, sir, allow them to vote without this qualification and they will demand education; they demand it; the school-houses will rise; school-teachers will be employed; these people will attend the schools, and the cause of education will be carried forward in this District with more rapidity than at any other period in its history.

Apply this same principle in these rebel States. I hear this foolish cry in the present condition of the country about impartial suffrage. Here are four million colored people in the rebel States; here are eight hundred thousand voters; perhaps ten per cent. of them may have the ability to read and a few thousands to write; but not one per cent. of those who could read and write would ever be permitted to vote under this reading and writing amendment by the men who are determined to keep them from the ballot-box. You put the whole of the freedmen at the mercy of their enemies. All over this rebel country the midnight skies are lightened by the burning school-houses erected by the humanity, the charity, and the Christianity of the country to instruct the darkened intellects of emancipated bondmen. Adopt this provision that they shall be required to read and write, and their enemies who are now burning their school-houses will see to it that the school-houses they have spared are given to the flames. Strike off this qualification, let them vote at any rate, and these wicked people who are burning their school-houses will cease to burn their school-houses; they will then join in building school-houses for their instruction.

I have heard a great deal said, and it has been hinted at in the Senate, that we ought to address ourselves to restricting suffrage in this country instead of extending it. I hold that doctrine to be at war with the fundamental ideas upon which this Government rests. It is an aristocratic, undemocratic doctrine that ought to be scouted from the legislative halls of America. I have no sympathy with it. I say, and I am ready to maintain it anywhere, that the extension of the suffrage in this country has tended to extend education and liberal legislation, and to develop the moral, intellectual, and physical resources of America. Yes, sir, the extension of suffrage to the poor, to the toiling men of the country, has lifted them up, inspired them with hope, and developed everything that builds up a Christian, democratic Commonwealth. I thank the Senator from New Jersey for maintaining this doctrine as he has done, so ably and so clearly. It is the doctrine of progressive Christian statesmanship.

The Senator from Connecticut has great deference to the opinion of his State, as he ought to have. I have a reasonable deference to the opinions of the people of my State, but I will say to my friend from Connecticut, that I think the constitutional provisions to which he refers were born about a dozen years ago in those States. The States of Massachusetts and Connecticut were not harmed by the ignorance of the people; perhaps in no States were the mass of the voters better educated than in those States; we could have absorbed all the ignorance we had without any great harm to our institutions. That reading and writing provision was put into the constitution of my State by my political associates and friends, by the men who sent me to the Senate, but I thought then they were mistaken. They put another provision into the constitution, and that was that a man should be required to remain two years in the State after he was naturalized before he could vote. I openly opposed it. I received denunciations for it; but I told them they would get it out of the constitution as soon as possible, and it came out of the constitution as soon as the standard of rebellion was raised and our people, foreign-born as well as native-born, thronged around the banner of the country.

Sir, I believe in the right of suffrage for my country. I believe in it far more for the poor ignorant man. I believe that he is more of a man when he has it, and that he will use it in the future as he has in the past generally for the elevation and protection of the poor and lowly and dependent. No loyal man who has the right of suffrage shall ever have it taken away or abridged by me unless for crime. No poor laboring man shall ever accuse me before the bar of man or of God of voting against giving him the same right that I possess to go to the ballot-box.

The Senator from Connecticut asked me if I would vote for a man to come into the Senate who could not read and write, or to go on to the bench of the Supreme Court. Certainly I would not. Then he asked this question: would you raise a tribunal composed of men who could not read and write, that should pass upon the acts of the Senate and of the judicial tribunals of the country? I hope the Senator does not mean to restrict the right of suffrage only to the few who are capable of passing intelligently upon the decisions of the Supreme Court and the action of the Senate. He certainly could not mean that. I would not vote for a man to come into this Senate who could not read and write, but I freely invite every man in this country, whether he can read and write or not, to pass judgment upon the acts of the Senate, upon the words of Senators, and I believe that the judgment of the masses of the country will be generally correct.

It has been more than hinted that the people are growing more corrupt. Sir, I do not believe it. I believe the history of the world can furnish no such example of fidelity to country, liberty, and justice as has been furnished by the great mass of the people of this country during the last four months. The whole power and patronage of this Government, its corrupt and corrupting influences, have been freely used, dishonorably used, all over the country, to purchase, seduce, corrupt the masses of the people, and the people have emphatically spurned these bribes. They have shown to the world that they cannot be bought nor sold nor corrupted by such influences. There are a few corrupt men who may be bought or sold; but the masses of the people of this country are increasing in intelligence, are increasing in virtue, and they vote more intelligently every year of their lives. The country to-day is safer in the hands of the masses of the people than it was in the beginning of the century, when we had restrictions, when we required men to hold property in order to vote. Sir, I believe that the men who made the Constitution of the United States, who made the constitutions of the several States, so made the constitutions of the several States that a majority of the men who fought the battles of the Revolution could not vote and did not vote. I believe if you were to bring back the laws that existed in 1789 that a majority of the men who fought the battles of their country in this rebellion could not vote. The States required property qualifications so large that I doubt whether the majority of the soldiers who fought the battles of the rebellion would have property enough to vote under the earlier constitutions of the States. Sir, [Mr. ANTHONY in the chair,] in your State up to a very late period this property qualification existed. These restrictions upon suffrage have been brushed away by the people themselves, and the cause of liberty, justice, humanity, has been promoted by so doing.

I believe, Mr. President, we can educate these freedmen better by giving them the right of suffrage than we can if we keep them a lowly, degraded, and dependent class. We have applied this principle to the men who have come into the country from abroad. Suppose we had refused the right of voting to the Englishman, the Irishman, the German, and other emigrants to this country, they would have been nothing but the hewers of wood and drawers of water to this people. Giving them the right of suffrage, although misused often and abused, has advanced their condition and the development of the country. I am ready to apply the principle and accept the consequence of manhood suffrage. Christian democracy bids us lift the lowly up, and we shall find it safe to be just.

It has been hinted here by my friend from Connecticut that these enfranchised men may not always vote as we think they should vote. He reminds me that I have said they know their friends. Amid all the trials and darkness and outrage of the last seven years they knew the old flag; they knew the boys in blue, they knew the men who were fighting for the country and liberty; they revered the name of Abraham Lincoln, their emancipator, next to the God that made them; they were always for their country; they prayed for it, they fought for it, and they will stand by it in the future as in the past.

The Senator says they may be kindly treated and may be won by kind words and deeds. Sir, I hope they will be kindly treated. One of the chief reasons why I am for suffrage for them is that they may be kindly treated. What do we witness to-day? In the State of Texas it is said that nearly two thousand freedmen have been murdered since the close of the rebellion. I am told by General Hamilton that he has knowledge of hundreds of them. Seventy-nine are known to have been murdered in the State of Georgia, and double that number are believed to have been. Who has been convicted, who has been punished for these hundreds of murders, and for these terrible cruelties and outrages that have been perpetrated upon them? Nobody. Two men were sentenced to death in the State of Georgia a year ago last spring for murdering an old woman over sixty years of age, shooting her down and then beating her brains out with stones, and the President of the United States pardoned them. Where are the others? Phil Sheridan says it is folly to think of trying a white man for the murder of a freedman in his department. What white man has been tried, convicted, and executed for these hundreds, ay, thousands of murders that have taken place in the old slave-holding States? None.

We want to change all this. I want the ballot in the hands of these men so that their lives, their homes, their school-houses, their churches, their wives, and their children will be safe. If, when these men have got the power in their hands to protect themselves, the white men will give them their rights, build their school-houses, instruct them, employ them, deal honestly with them, protect the brutal, ignorant, cross-road, bar-room rowdies that infest portions of the country, I say if they will do justice, God will bless them for doing it. If the black man votes for the men who are just and humane, I shall not upbraid him. I do not believe the negro is to be any party's slave if you put the ballot in his hands. I want to call the attention of my Democratic friends especially to that point.

Our Democratic friends in Massachusetts have been sneering at me for years for advocating the emancipation of the negro and for his enfranchisement and elevation. What do we now witness? This autumn, in the cities of Boston and Charlestown, two black men were elected to the Legislature. One of them was an educated soldier, a lieutenant in the Army, whose leg had been shot off in a battle in South Carolina. He was elected in Boston. The other gentleman was a lawyer of good standing, a man of capacity and character in the city of Charlestown, residing right under the shadow of Bunker Hill. Last Monday there was an election for mayor, aldermen, and common councilmen in the city of Boston. In the third ward the colored men thought they ought to have one of the councilors, and in the Republican nominating convention they did not get what they wanted. A colored man was taken up at once by the Democratic party and put upon their ticket. The black candidate on their ticket ran ahead of any one of their other candidates. One of the Republicans ran behind. The lowest on the Republican ticket received four hundred and ninety-four votes; the highest on the Democratic ticket, a black man, Mr. Brown, received four hundred and ninety-four votes, so there was no choice. Another election was ordered, and on Wednesday the spectacle was witnessed of the Democracy of the third ward of Boston going up to the ballot-boxes, their candidate a negro, and the Republicans going up to the ballot-boxes, their candidate a white man, and we know to-day who won. [Laughter.]

Senators, give the negro the right of suffrage in this District, and before a year passes round you will see Mayor Wallach and aldermen and common councilmen attending their schools, making speeches to them at their meetings. You will see these men, who voted that they should not have the right to vote, running after them and inquiring after the health of their wives and children. These negroes will then be just as sweet as anybody else. [Laughter.] I do not think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] will be examining their pelvis or shins, or making speeches about the formation of their lips or the angle of their foreheads on the floor of the Senate. You will then see the Democracy, with the keen scent that always distinguishes that party, on the hunt after the votes of these black men, [laughter;] and if they treat them better than the Republicans do they will probably get their votes, and I hope they will.

And it will be just so down in these rebel States. Give the negroes of Virginia the right to vote, and you will find Wise and Letcher and the whole tribe of the secessionists undertaking to prove that from the landing at Jamestown in 1620 the first families of the Old Dominion have always been the champions and the special friends of the negroes of Old Virginia, and that there is a great deal of kindred between them, [laughter;] that they are relations, brethren; that the same red blood courses in the veins of many of them. They will establish all these things, perhaps by affidavits. [Laughter.] And I say to you, sir, they will have a good opportunity to get a good many of their votes, for in these respects they have the advantage of us poor Republicans.

You will find that the school-houses will spring up. No Representative will come from Virginia and boast that he has not a newspaper in his district after that. The cause of education, the cause of liberty will be advanced everywhere by it. If these black men, whose rights I advocate here to-day, whose rights I have advocated for thirty years, and mean to advocate no matter how they vote, shall hereafter be better treated, their rights better secured by those who went into the rebellion to establish slavery forever, those who opposed their enfranchisement, I shall be content. The great thing in this world is not to run after votes. I am ready to do my part of that work, and I think I have done my full share of it. The thing is to establish just, humane, and equal laws, laws that shall recognize the rights of all classes and conditions of men, and give the poorest man that breathes God's air or walks His green earth the right to make of himself all that his Creator intended for him. When we have established these rights in law, when we have put them in execution, the great work will have been done; and these people, as they grow in education and intelligence, as their rights are permanently secured, I have not a doubt will divide like other men among political parties, and will follow their own inclinations, their own wishes and interests; and that is what all right-minded men desire they should do.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not intend to say a word on this bill, and shall not now occupy the attention of the Senate more than a moment or two.

I always listen to the Senator from Pennsylvania with interest and instruction, but I am not able to agree with him upon the construction which he has given to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut. I feel it to be my duty to support that amendment, but not upon the construction given by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The amendment provides that "no person who has not heretofore voted in this District shall be permitted to vote unless he shall be able at the time of offering to vote to read and also to write his own name." I think a fair construction of that amendment is that the voter shall be required to be able generally to read, and in addition to that, to write his own name; and with that construction of the amendment I propose to vote for it, as I said yesterday, not because I am in favor, as a general proposition, of an intelligence qualification for the right to vote, but because, in this particular instance, I think it to be proper to prescribe it.

I cannot speak for other sections of the country, but for the Northwest I think I am justified in saying that there is a great deal of intelligence found among men who are not able to read. They do not acquire their information from books, but from intercourse one with another. In that part of the United States our population is made up of men coming from the New England States, men coming from the central portions of the country, and also persons from the southern States. These people meet in the same neighborhoods. They have intercourse with each other, and the one communicates to the other what he knows. They attend the popular meetings; they hear the political questions of the day discussed; they are called upon the juries, and they hear the law discussed both by the attorneys and by the court, and in the course of a generation many men who are not able to read and write become very intelligent men and entirely competent to the exercise of political power. I have addressed, in the course of my professional life, very many men as jurors, who were excellent jurors indeed, who were not able to read. Perhaps gentlemen from other sections of the country are not able to understand exactly how this may be. I attribute it to the fact that our population is made up of citizens coming from every part of the country, and in their intercourse they communicate to one another the peculiar information of each, and because also of the popular institutions which prevail, calling the people together in public assemblies and hearing the great questions of the day discussed, and the popular character of our courts in which the laws of the land are freely discussed.

But, sir, does that state of fact at all apply to the colored people? They have had none of these opportunities of obtaining intelligence which I have mentioned. They have been in a state of servitude. They have never mingled with citizens of other sections of the country, and thereby acquired information. They have never been called into the courts to hear the laws and institutions of the country discussed. They have never attended the popular meetings and there heard discussed the institutions and policy of the land. They have had none of the means of information which has made intelligent men out of many in the Northwest who are not able to read and write.

The Senator from Pennsylvania will hardly say that intelligence acquired in some way or other is not important to the citizen. He certainly is not prepared to question that which has become almost an axiom with us, that our institutions rest upon the virtue and the intelligence of the people. Has that been a mistake all the while, or in fact do our institutions rest upon public virtue and public intelligence? If so, I submit to Senators whether the slave coming from the farm, who has never heard the Constitution of his country either read or discussed, who has no knowledge whatever, and has had no opportunity of acquiring knowledge of the laws of the country, of the policy proposed, of the policy that has governed us in the past, or that is proposed for the future, is competent to exercise political power in this country? For many offices it is only important to know the character of the candidate. For merely administrative or executive offices it is enough for us to know that the man we vote for is an honest man and a man of ordinary intelligence, because the discharge of the duties of his office has no influence upon the political policy of the country; but when we come to vote for the legislator or any executive officer who has any influence upon the legislation of the country, is it then only important that we should know the man? Is it not important, then, that we shall comprehend the policy that he is to advocate and carry out as a legislator? Then intelligence becomes important, not only to know the particular candidate, his qualities, whether he has intelligence and honesty and fitness for the office, but it becomes important that we shall know the policy and system of laws which he will favor; and I submit whether the negroes coming from the plantation have that sort of information or have had the opportunity to acquire that sort of information in any way.

Mr. President, the objection has been made to this bill that it proposes an ex post facto punishment. I thought the objection made by the Senator from Pennsylvania was well made, and I think the Senator from New Jersey did not meet it. It is not enough to say that the right to vote is a conventional and not a natural right, that it is the result of the social organization. Suppose it be a conventional right; but it seems to me if goes back of that. I know that the right of voting is regulated by law, yet when men enter into the social compact as equals and agree to a form of government and that the power shall rest with the people, is it not a natural right after they have made such a compact that their equality shall not be disturbed. But suppose it to be a conventional right, and a conventional right is taken away from a man because he has committed a crime, is not that a punishment? It has so been considered. This is not a new question. In the reign of George III an act of Parliament taking away the right to vote was regarded as a bill of attainder, a bill of punishment. Upon that subject I will read from Woodson's Lectures, volume one, lecture forty-one:

"Thus in the case of New Shoreham sixty-eight electors for that borough by name are disqualified to vote for members of Parliament. Such incapacity was part of the punishment provided by the general law against bribery. The operation, therefore, of this legislative sentence was to preclude the necessity of formal convictions against each individual, their guilt being thought sufficiently apparent."

"It must be admitted that in all penal statutes passed ex post facto, except where the innovation mollifies the rigor of the criminal code, justice wears her sternest aspect. Moral conscience and human frailty have no longer the additional guidance of the law."

There, sir, an act of Parliament which took away from sixty-eight men the right to vote for a member of Parliament because those sixty-eight men had committed the crime of bribery at an election was regarded as a bill of pains and penalties, regarded so by this writer, regarded so by Parliament itself, regarded so by the courts.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Indiana will allow me, I desire to call his attention to a section of the statute passed by Congress punishing treason.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One part of the punishment is described in the third section:

"And be it further enacted, That every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be forever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States."

This is the act of 1862 "to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, and for other purposes;" so that the disqualification to hold office was a part of the punishment for the crime of treason committed after the passage of the act.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The act of Parliament to which I refer, is the fifty-fifth chapter of the second of George III. I will ask Senators who apologize for this proposition whether citizenship is a natural right. It is very clear that it is not. The man who comes from a foreign land into our country is not, by virtue of any natural right, a citizen. He becomes a citizen because our political community agree to it. The right of citizenship is a conventional right; yet as a punishment, in direct terms, for crime, Congress has said the right of citizenship shall be taken away. I refer to the act passed in 1865 punishing desertion. It is on the same line of thought suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin:

"That, in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof."

Expressly as a punishment. It is not, certainly, and no lawyer will say it is, important by what term this is known. The question is, is the proposition a punishment for an act done? I suppose in all the States disfranchisement is found as one of the punishments. I will read from one section of the laws of Indiana, with which I am more familiar than with the laws of other States. As a part of the punishment for larceny, it is provided that upon conviction thereof the party—

"Shall be fined not exceeding double the value of the goods stolen, be imprisoned in the State prison not less than two nor more than fourteen years, and be disfranchised and rendered incapable of holding any office of trust or profit for any determinate period."

I suppose similar legislation is found in the other States. I have not taken the trouble to examine. Then, sir, a proposition to take away the right of voting from sixty-eight men by an act of Parliament because of an offense committed before that time was regarded as a bill of attainder, a bill of pains and penalties. The act of Congress to which I have referred, the act of Congress to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred, applies in express terms to the stripping of the citizen of his citizenship as a punishment for a crime, and the laws of the State do the same. In this bill we propose to take away from men the right to vote which they now enjoy under existing laws because of a crime committed before this time. Can that be done when the Constitution prohibits the enactment of an ex post facto law?

Upon the general proposition, I have but very little to say in regard to this bill. I will not vote for it. In regard to the people of this District, I hold that I occupy the same relation to them that I would to the people of the State of Indiana were I a member of the Legislature of that State. The people of the District I understand to be my constituency in passing laws that are to govern them and them only. By a very large vote, almost unanimous, they have declared that they want no such law as this. If I were a representative in the Legislature of Indiana, and all the people of the State of Indiana at a popular election, except thirty-five, were to say to me not to vote for a bill, would I dare to vote for it? Would any Senator in his State Legislature, being instructed by all the people except thirty-five to vote against a measure, dare to vote for it? I think every Senator will say he would not, that he would regard so strong an expression of the popular desire as controlling his conduct. Then, sir, when we legislate for the people of this District, enacting a law not affecting our constituencies at home at all, but only affecting the people of this District, why have they not the right to instruct us? If all the people desire that a law shall not be passed, why will we not respect that instruction? I cannot understand that Congress being clothed with the legislative power for this District has the power to disregard the desires of the people. Are laws not to be made agreeable to the people that are to obey them? Is not that a general principle of popular government? But because these people in the District do not elect us, because we are not dependent upon their votes for our offices, have we a right to disregard their wishes? In regard to the people of Indiana, when the law affects them I should obey their wish; and when I come to vote upon a bill that affects only the people of the District, it seems to me, for the purposes of that bill, they are my constituency and I must respect their will.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, at this stage of the debate, when the Senate are exceedingly anxious to vote, in which anxiety I certainly participate, I shall content myself rather with stating my positions upon the question than arguing or giving reasons for them. It is necessary, perhaps, in order that my position may be fully understood, that I state very briefly how I shall vote, and still more briefly the reasons for that vote.

I understand, first, that all the just powers of government derive their authority from the consent of the governed. Here is a proposition to confer, first, the right of suffrage upon the colored people of this District without qualification. An amendment proposes to confer that same right with certain qualifications. I shall vote to confer the right upon the colored people of the District without regard to qualifications, recognizing simply that they are the governed in this District, that they are citizens by virtue of the civil rights bill, by virtue of the constitutional amendment, from the fact that they are native, born to the manor. I, then, shall vote for this proposition without any qualification or restrictions.

I do not feel with my distinguished colleague that I am simply the representative of the people of the District. I read in the Constitution of the United States that Congress shall have exclusive legislative jurisdiction over the ten miles square to be ceded to the United States for the purposes of a General Government. In my vote here to-day I am equally the representative of the whole people of the United States as I am the representative of the people of this District. If we are alone the representatives of the people of the District, why are we not alone elected by the people of the District? This is a great question in which the whole people are interested, every voter in Indiana precisely as much as every resident in the District of Columbia. Our power to legislate is full and plenary over all subjects of legislation. Then the only question is, whether the right of suffrage is a proper subject of legislation? If so, our power is complete and ample over the whole subject. I believe that no man will doubt the constitutional power of Congress to legislate upon all subjects proper to be legislated upon, and that the right of suffrage is one of the subjects most peculiarly within our legislative jurisdiction.

But we are told that we should not force this measure upon an unwilling constituency, taking it for granted that the people of this District upon this subject are alone our constituents, that we should not force it upon them, because they, the citizens of this District, by a deliberate vote, have determined that they do not desire any such thing. Who has determined it? Who ordered this election, and who voted at this election? Your mayor and common council, without any authority of law whatever, ordered an election in the District to determine upon a question over which they had no possible jurisdiction. They derive all their power to legislate from the acts of Congress. They have an act of incorporation allowing them to do certain things and to legislate upon certain subjects; but where is the authority of your mayor and common council to order an election to instruct the people's representatives as to the legislation in this District? Where is any such authority? The whole election was unauthorized and a voluntary act upon the part of the people of this District, and was so regarded by very many of the most loyal residents of the District. Such was their understanding of this election and its invalidity that they refused to attend the polls; and hence it is that you have only thirty-five votes in favor of this proposition. But by your legislation you have made the colored people of this District citizens. The question now is, whether you shall enfranchise them. The men who have oppressed them, who have grown rich upon their unrequited toil for two hundred years, meet in solemn conclave and resolve that the colored man, a freeman and citizen as he is, shall not be permitted to vote! If you wish a vote, pass an act of Congress and let all vote, the colored as well as the white, and then there may be some validity and some authority in your election. So much for the instructions that we have received upon this subject.

I shall vote to enfranchise the colored residents of this District because I believe it is right, just, and proper, because I believe it is in accordance with those two grand central truths around which cluster every hope for redeemed humanity, the common fatherhood of God above us and the brotherhood of universal mankind. I go to the original principle and right of the question, and hence I shall vote to enfranchise the colored people of this District.

But gentlemen tell us they are not qualified to vote. What are the two constituent elements which should enter into the character of a good voter? Loyalty first, and intelligence secondly.

These are the only two elements which need necessarily enter into the constitution of a good voter—patriotism and intelligence—in order to exercise appropriately the right of suffrage. First, as to loyalty, how does it stand in this District? According to numbers, the colored population have furnished more soldiers to the Army of the Republic than the white residents of the District. The report of our Provost Marshal General shows it. Their patriotism is undisputed. Their color, a badge as it is of oppression and degradation and servitude, is equally a badge known and read of all men of loyalty and devotion to the Government under which we live. Their loyalty has been tested everywhere upon the battle-field and in administering kindly to your prisoners. They were and have been the loyal element. They have turned out nobly to defend the country. Without any attack upon the people of the District, the records of the provost marshal's office show that here at least, in proportion to numbers, they have given more soldiers to the Army than have the patriotic white residents of the District. Then we have the first element—loyalty.

Now, secondly, as to their intelligence, my distinguished colleague from Indiana says that although opposed to this test of intelligence as applied to white men, yet, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, he is in favor of applying it to colored men. For the last two hundred years it has been impossible for these poor slaves to educate themselves. Under the laws of many of the States it has been a penal offense to teach them their letters, and to read the Gospel of eternal truth and to teach them to read it has been a penitentiary offense. These poor people have hitherto had no opportunity of education, no opportunity of learning; and because they cannot read and write now they are to be disfranchised, while white men who have had the advantages of free institutions and of the means of education are to be permitted to vote in ignorance, the result of their own want of attention, perhaps, or want of disposition. It is not proper to apply the test to the white man who cannot read, but altogether proper to apply it to the colored man who has had no possible opportunity to learn to read! I think the ballot itself is worth all the schools and all the schoolmasters to educate voters to enable them to vote intelligently.

You have freed by your legislation and by your constitutional amendment four and a half million slaves; you have made them citizens, free before the law, free before the Constitution as it soon will be declared. Now, sir, one of two things is true: you must either give these colored people the right to protect themselves, or you must take upon yourselves for all time to come the duty of their protection; for they cannot be abandoned. They must be enabled to protect themselves or you must protect them. If you protect them, you must continue in operation your charitable associations, your Freedmen's Bureau, your civil rights bill, and all that system of legislation, or you may abandon them the very moment you permit them to vote. Then they are self-protecting, self-sustaining. I vote therefore to confer this ballot upon the colored people here because of our duty to protect them, and because it is cheaper and in every sense better to give them self-protection than to extend to them the protection of the Government. So much in reference to that.

Now, in reference to their intelligence, we find that in the District of Columbia the colored people subscribe, pay for, and read over five thousand daily newspapers. We find that they have seven thousand colored children in their own schools. We find that they have religious, benevolent, and philanthropic associations sustained alone by the colored people of the District. That would argue, to my mind, a state of intelligence far from dangerous to the public liberty of the country.

But my distinguished colleague would not force this right of suffrage upon an unwilling people. Do you not remember that the same protest was urged by those same resident citizens of Washington against the emancipation of the slaves in this District? Would my colleague recall that glorious act, that act which flashed like a sunburst of liberty in the darkness of our legislation upon the subject of African slavery in this District and under the shadow of the Capitol? Would he recall that act emancipating the slaves in the District? Would any man recall it? Would he again rivet the chains of slavery upon the freed limbs of these emancipated slaves? And yet that act was passed over the earnest remonstrance of the people of the District. When we placed them in the Army they remonstrated against that, and against the general proclamation of emancipation. They have thrown themselves across the pathway of the onward march of this nation to the redemption of the nation and the supremacy of free institutions from the beginning of the rebellion to the present moment. What act of ours calculated to suppress the rebellion has yet met the approbation of the white residents of the District of Columbia? Not one single one.

Mr. President, I shall vote to enfranchise and give the right of suffrage to the colored people of this District. But gentlemen ask me if I would force negro suffrage upon the States lately in rebellion. I understand that under the Constitution of the United States the right of suffrage is left to be regulated by the respective States as they see fit. Those loyal States that have never forfeited their right to participate in the Government of the country have to-day full control over that whole subject. Whenever the rebel States shall be remitted to their rights under the Constitution and permitted to participate in the government of the country, when their relations to the Federal Government shall be fully restored, the regulation of the right of suffrage may appertain to them; but they never can be remitted to those rights except upon the terms and at the time that the Congress of the United States shall permit them. We have proposed to them the constitutional amendment. One reason why I voted for that amendment was that I supposed that in order to retain their political power in the country they themselves, when remitted to their constitutional relations, would permit the colored people to vote.

I yet believe that will be the operation of the constitutional amendment. But suppose they reject it, what then? We have held up to the rebellious States the constitutional amendment as the brazen serpent was held up in the wilderness to the children of Israel. We tell them to look approvingly upon the constitutional amendment and be healed from all the evils inflicted by the fiery serpents of treason, sedition, and rebellion. If they look not, then they perish in their sins and in the wilderness, and by my vote shall never get representation in these Halls. When they shall reject that amendment giving to them the full power to determine the right of suffrage in their own States, it will be necessary perhaps to resort to other means. What are those other means? To assert all the constitutional power which devolves upon Congress. We alone have the power to restore, to reconstruct, to revivify, to resurrect; and without the almighty power of Congress neither the President nor the Cabinet nor any earthly authority has a right to restore these rebellious States to their constitutional relations to the United States.

Gentlemen ask me how I would vote if the same proposition were pending in my own State. I have only to say this: as I understand it the State of Indiana has forfeited none of her rights of State sovereignty by any rebellion; she has a right to fix this matter as she pleases within her own limits; but if I were called upon in my State to vote for a constitutional amendment in favor of universal manhood suffrage I should unhesitatingly vote for it. I should unhesitatingly vote for it in Indiana or anywhere else. The right to vote may not be strictly a natural right, but it is so intimately connected with the right of self-defense and self-preservation that it is hard to distinguish where the one begins and the other ends. So far I am clear, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" to-day I vote to enfranchise the colored people in the District of Columbia. I do it proudly. I believe the people demand it. I have never dodged the issue. I have been ready to vote for it for the last six years, I am ready to vote for it now, and I give this vote with more pride and as much pleasure as I have given any vote in this body.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I have already voted against the proposition to strike the word "male" out of the bill, and I shall now vote against the pending proposition to fix an educational test. In each case I am governed by the same consideration.

In voting against striking the word "male" out of the bill, I did not intend to express any opinion on the question which has at last found its way into the Senate Chamber, whether women shall be invested with the elective franchise. That question I leave untouched, contenting myself with saying, that it is obviously the great question of the future, which will be easily settled, whenever the women in any considerable proportion insist that it shall be settled. And so in voting against an educational test I do not mean to say that under certain circumstances such test may not be proper. But I am against it on the present occasion.

The bill under consideration is the enfranchisement of the colored race in the District of Columbia. It completes Emancipation by Enfranchisement. It entitles all to vote without distinction of color. The courts, and the rail-cars of the District, even the galleries of Congress, have been opened to colored persons. It only remains that the ballot-box be opened to them. Such is my sense not only of the importance but of the necessity of this measure; so essential does it appear to me for the establishment of peace, security, and reconciliation, that I am unwilling that it shall be clogged, burdened, or embarrassed by anything else. I wish to vote on this measure alone. Therefore, whatever may be the merits of other questions, I shall have no difficulty in putting them aside until this is settled.

The bill for Impartial Suffrage in the District of Columbia concerns directly some twenty thousand colored persons, whom it will lift to the adamant platform of Equal Rights. If it were regarded simply in its bearings on the District it would be difficult to exaggerate its value; but when it is regarded as an example to the whole country under the sanction of Congress, its value is infinite. It is in the latter character that it becomes a pillar of fire to illumine the footsteps of millions. What we do here will be done in the disorganized States. Therefore we must be careful that what we do here is best for the disorganized States.

If the question could be confined in its influence to the District, I should have little objection to an educational test. I should be glad to witness the experiment and be governed by the result. But the question cannot be limited to the District. Practically it takes the whole country into its sphere. We must, therefore, act for the whole country. This is the exigency of the present moment.

Now, to my mind nothing is clearer than the absolute necessity of the suffrage for all colored persons in the disorganized States. It will not be enough if you give it to those who read and write; you will not in this way acquire the voting force which you need there for the protection of Unionists, whether white or black. You will not secure the new allies which are essential to the national cause. As you once needed the muskets of the colored persons, so now you need their votes; and you must act now with little reference to theory. You are bound by the necessity of the case. Therefore when I am asked to open the suffrage to women, or when I am asked to establish an educational standard, I cannot on the present bill simply because the controlling necessity under which we act will not allow it. By a singular Providence we are now constrained to this measure of Enfranchisement for the sake of peace, security, and reconciliation, so that loyal persons, white or black, may be protected and that the Republic may live. Here in the District of Columbia we begin the real work of reconstruction by which the Union will be consolidated forever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] to the amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. YATES. Upon this proposition I have agreed to pair off with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] If he were present he would vote "yea" and I "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Hendricks, Nesmith, Patterson, Biddle, and Wiley—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Fowler, Guthrie, Johnson, McDougall, Nye, and Yates—7.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend by striking out in the fifth line of the first section the words "left the District of Columbia to give," and insert "given," so as to make the exception read, "and excepting persons who may have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the clause which the Senator desires to amend has already been agreed to as an amendment, and therefore it cannot be now amended.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I shall move my amendment in the Senate. We are now acting as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by adding two new sections:

And be it further enacted, That it is hereby declared unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, to promise, offer, or give, or procure, or cause to be promised, offered, or given, any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, understanding, obligation, or security for the payment or delivery of any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any other valuable thing whatever, to any person with the intent to influence his vote to be given at any election hereafter to be held within the District of Columbia, and every person so offending shall on conviction thereof be fined in any sum not exceeding $2,000, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

And be it further enacted, That any person who shall accept, directly or indirectly, any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, obligation, or security for the payment or delivery of any money, goods, right in action, bribe, present, or reward, or any other valuable thing whatever to influence his vote at any election hereafter to be held in the District of Columbia, shall on conviction be imprisoned not less than one year and be forever disfranchised.

I will simply say that one of these sections makes it unlawful to buy votes and punishes a man for attempting to buy them, and the other punishes the man who sells his vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I know very little about the laws relating to the District of Columbia; but I cannot imagine that any civilized community could have existed as long as this District has done without some legislation to punish bribery at elections; and I will therefore call on the honorable chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia to inform the Senate as to the necessity of the proposed amendment. Is there not some law to punish bribery at elections in the District of Columbia that is sufficient?

Mr. MORRILL. There is no uniform law on the subject I believe. All there is on the subject is under the law of Maryland existing in this District at the time when it came under the jurisdiction of Congress. I think there is no law on the subject except such as may be found in the Maryland code at the time this District fell under the jurisdiction of Congress, and the rule is not uniform in either of the two cities or in the country quarter of the District.

Mr. HOWARD. If that be the case I hope this amendment will pass.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the first section of the amendment reported by the committee by striking from the seventh line the words "is a citizen thereof," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "shall have been born in." The object of this amendment is to leave it not open to dispute what class of persons are citizens of the United States, inasmuch as the present standing law on the subject, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dred Scott, declares that negroes are not and cannot be citizens of the United States. I know that the civil rights bill declares that they are. I have no doubt whatever that they were so without the civil rights bill, and that if they were not, the civil rights bill clearly and lawfully makes them so; but it will be made a question by the persons who are authorized to decide in this District who are voters and who are not standing upon that decision, and I very much fear that without this amendment it will be many years, as this District is at present organized, before these people are allowed to vote if you leave open to them the question of who is a citizen and who is not. With that view, governed by the same impulse which has governed us hitherto when we have been called upon to act on this subject, I move this amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he add the words "or naturalized" after the word "born."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I accept that.

Mr. POMEROY. There are a great many citizens who were not born here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to the modification. Being a native know-nothing myself, [laughter,] I had forgotten our foreign brethren.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as modified, is to strike out in line seven of section one of the amendment of the committee the words "is a citizen of," and to insert "shall have been born or naturalized in."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to amend the amendment of the committee in line nine of section one. It now reads "shall have resided in the said District for the period of one year previous to." I move to amend by striking out "previous to" and inserting "next preceding," so as to limit the time of residence to one year next preceding the election.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move further to amend by filling the blank in section seven with the words "1st of March."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I propose, to change the order of the section, to strike out the fifth section where it occurs, and place it at the end of the amendment. It is the general repealing clause of all formal acts inconsistent with the present, and should be at the end of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made, there being no objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I propose a small amendment at the end of the fourth section by inserting these words, "next preceding the holding of any general or city election in said District." This is the section which directs the court to give this act in charge to the grand jury on the first day of their session. It ought to be done at the session immediately preceding an election.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following section:

And be it further enacted, That if any person shall knowingly vote at any election or on any question without having a lawful right to do so he shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, and shall be thereafter disqualified to vote.

I have looked through the penal code of the District of Columbia, and I do not find any provision for the punishment of illegal voting, which is the most common form of a violation of the franchise laws; and I am told by a gentleman from Maryland, a lawyer in whose knowledge and judgment I have great confidence, that the old Maryland laws in force in the District on that subject are exceedingly loose and defective, therefore it is that I offer this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator why he adds "or on any question." Is it not quite enough to say "at any election?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. It frequently happens in most parts of the country that questions which are not merely elective questions are submitted to the people. Municipal questions, a variety of questions, are often submitted to the voters of an election precinct in a city, town, county, or State, which are not merely the selection of persons to fill offices, but which are public questions left to the primary determination of the people's will. Now, if in such a case a person should claim and exercise the right to participate in the decision of such a question, knowing that he had no legal right to do so, it appears to my humble apprehension that he is equally deserving of punishment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think that is safe. It is sometimes the case that a vote of the people is taken very irregularly on some questions, and I do not know that there ought to be a penalty of that kind for such a proceeding, and I move to strike out those words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This being an amendment to an amendment it is not amendable.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Vermont must be aware that there is a registry law in this bill, and no one's vote can be received unless his name is on that registry. The crime is committed when a man gets himself registered improperly as well as when he votes improperly.

Mr. GRIMES. I apprehend that the difficulty originates from the fact that the Senator from Vermont imagines that the elections here may possibly be of the character of those that are held in New England, where at a town meeting various questions are presented. Such is not the case anywhere out of New England. In the other States all that is done by any elector at any election is depositing his ballot in the box. To all of us who are familiar with elections outside of New England, and as they are conducted here, the word "elections" seems more proper than the phraseology used by the Senator from Vermont in his amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment includes both. It meets the point made by my friend from Iowa, and it goes a step further. It may be possibly that as the law now stands there cannot be any legal mode of submitting a question to the people of this District.

Mr. GRIMES. It would be submitted at an election, would it not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; it would not be submitted at an election. Supposing it to be lawful for the common council of this city, if that is the style of the government of it, to leave it to the people of this District to say whether a tax of twenty cents on the dollar of the ratable estate of this District should be raised for the purpose of lighting the streets, and the common council should submit it to the people to say whether they would raise that tax or not, the submission of that question, as I understand the ordinary use of terms, would not be an election; but it would be a question submitted to their legislative authority, if they have it, for them to pass upon.

Now, then, if a man knowingly votes without having authority to do so on a question of that description it appears to me he ought to be punished. Therefore having provided for every case of election, there can be no harm in adding a prohibition and a punishment of any other species of illegal voting which may possibly exist.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask to have the pending amendment read again.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend it by striking out the latter clause providing for disqualification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This being an amendment to an amendment is not amendable in the third degree.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the provision is too severe. Suppose a man votes under a misapprehension of his right to vote, would you go so far as to disqualify him for voting forever afterward?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The provision is that it must be done knowingly.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the clause is very general in its form and would include everybody who votes unlawfully, whether knowingly or not. I think the penalty would be very severe. I think the Senator from Vermont will find that I am correct about it. If that be the real character of the amendment, I cannot vote for it; because I would not vote to disqualify a person who had voted ignorantly when he was disqualified to vote. At all events I think it entirely unnecessary to add the disqualifying clause, because a fine, in my judgment, would in all cases be quite sufficient. I believe that no such clause is to be found in any of the statutes of the States for the punishment of illegal voting; certainly not in my own State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg that the Secretary may report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe that the penal statutes of every eastern State, although I do not upon that subject speak by the book, punish illegal voting, and by that I mean voting by a person who has no lawful right to do so, knowing that he has not the right; that is, a person who commits a fraud upon the other voters of his community by undertaking to participate with them in the exercise of that right. Every statute-book of an eastern State I believe adds to the punishment of fine the indefinite suspension of that privilege until the law-making power shall choose afterward by a pardon of restoration to his legal rights to reinstate him; and it ought to be so. A man who fraudulently and corruptly undertakes to assert the privilege of exercising that high prerogative—and it has been demonstrated to us here in a two days' debate that it is a high prerogative—deserves more than any other man, except it may be for treason, for it is analogous to that, to be disqualified from ever afterward being seen about the polls or at a ballot-box. He ought to be so. If it were open to doubt upon the phraseology of this amendment whether this crime must be committed knowingly, which is the essential element of all crime, there would be great force in the objection to the disqualifying clause and to the whole clause from beginning to end; because no man ought to be punished for merely voting when he has not a right to do so if he honestly believes that he has the right. But this section, framed in the hurry of the moment to be sure, is, so far as I recollect, in the very substance of the language of the penal statutes of most of the States on this subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont a little more particularly to the suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas. This bill provides that at a certain time there shall be a board in session and that that board shall hear evidence in regard to the qualifications of voters and shall decide and make a list, and none shall vote except those who are upon that list. Now, I submit to the Senator from Vermont whether a man can be an illegal voter after that adjudication. I do not think it ought to be an open question after that. Where a man's right to vote has been inquired into by the proper board and has been decided, I do not think after that it ought to be said that he is an illegal voter.

Mr. MORRILL. I hardly know what the effect of this provision would be, and I must appeal to the Senate to maintain the bill as it is. If it shall turn out in future that there is any necessity for extending provisions in this direction, it will be a very easy thing to do it. Inasmuch as there is some little question about the extent and the propriety of it, I hope my friend from Vermont will withdraw it, and if it be found necessary it may be reported hereafter upon a general view having in view the subject to which he advert.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall certainly yield to the wishes of my friend from Maine, the gentleman who has charge of the bill, on this point. I should not have offered the amendment but that it appeared from the report of the committee that they had undertaken to provide a criminal code in the bill itself for the government and the regulation of the exercise of this right; and if in this bill we are to provide a criminal code upon that subject it ought certainly to be reasonably complete and perfect. But inasmuch as my friend from Maine, in whose judgment and in whose faith I have the greatest confidence, desires that this amendment should be withdrawn, I shall, out of deference to his wishes, withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and insert the substitute as that substitute has been amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. POMEROY. Now, before the question is taken on concurring in the amendment, I move to amend it by striking out in line seven of section one the words "left the District of Columbia to give" and inserting "given;" so as to read "excepting persons who have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebellion."

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas whether the effect of that amendment will not be to disfranchise a person who may have once given aid and comfort to the rebellion, although he may afterward have borne arms in defense of the country in the late war. I do not know whether there are such individuals in this District, but in our State we have passed laws excusing individuals who had formerly given aid and comfort to the rebellion but afterward had served in the Union armies.

Another very great hardship in all probability will arise, as this bill provides for all elections, not only municipal elections, but all elections for subscribing money. This would disfranchise any person from voting even upon a money proposition. ["Oh, no."] Yes it would. I have my doubts about the propriety of that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended, was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. YATES. I desire to state that I have paired off on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] If he were here, he would vote against the bill, and I would vote for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Frothinghams, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hendricks, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Fowler, Guthrie, Johnson, McDougall, Nye, and Yates—7.

So the bill was passed.

The announcement of the result was greeted with applause in the galleries, which was checked by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to this resolution, if it be modified so as to strike out the clause authorizing the committee to report at any time.

Lyon, bearing date February 3, 1866, be released and confirmed to the said Lyon.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask leave to report back from the Committee on Naval Affairs Senate bill No. 176, for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States, with a recommendation that it do pass. There is a report accompanying the bill, and unless some gentleman desires further information, after it has been read I shall ask for the previous question.

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed, in settling the accounts of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States, to allow him pay as a commander from the 16th of July, 1862, in the same way and manner as if the order discharging him from the naval service had never been issued.

It appears from the report that the petitioner alleges that, being an officer in the Navy on the 5th of August, A. D. 1862, he was promoted to his present rank, to date from the 16th day of the preceding July; that the Senate on the 21st day of the then next February confirmed him as such commander.

He further alleges that while he was on duty, on the 12th of October, 1862, he received official notice by a letter from the Navy Department, dated September 20, 1862, that he was dismissed from the naval service; and that he remained in that situation until he was, on the 21st of February, 1863, confirmed as commander by the Senate on a nomination of the President made on the 12th of the same month. Under these circumstances, he prays that he may be allowed pay as commander afloat from the 16th of July, 1862, to the 12th of October, in the same year, and of a commander waiting orders from the latter date to the 21st of February, 1863, when he was confirmed in his present office by the Senate.

The facts alleged in the petition the committee find, on reference to the official records of the Government, to be true.

The nomination of Commander Preble, made by the President on the 12th of February, 1863, to take rank from the 16th of July previous, the precise time from which his former appointment was to date, and its subsequent confirmation by the Senate on the 21st of the same month, in the opinion of your committee had the effect, and was manifestly intended to have the effect, of putting him precisely where he would have been if the order of the Navy Department of September 20, 1862, discharging him from the naval service, had never been issued, and must be considered and taken to be a full revocation of that order, and a condonation of any real or supposed offense or delinquency on his part subsequent to the period from which his commission was to entitle him to take rank. Under these circumstances your committee are of opinion that the prayer of the petitioner is just and reasonable and ought to be granted, and report a bill for his relief.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It seems to me it is establishing an important principle, and that if we adopt it the Lord only knows where it will end. If we adopt it in the Navy it must apply to the Army. It seems a certain commander in the Navy was dismissed from the service, that he was out of the service for six months and was then restored; and this bill, as I understand, proposes to pay him for the time he was out of the service. If we adopt that principle there are hundreds and hundreds of cases of like character in the Army as well as in the Navy, and there is no telling what amount of money we will be compelled to pay to men who have not been in the service at all. Unless there are some peculiar circumstances in this case, taking it out of this general principle, I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I said on the introduction of the report, I should content myself with the facts there presented, unless some gentleman, or the House itself, showed a disposition that further facts should be stated, or the principles upon which the committee acted should be given. This bill, as will have been seen by the House, is to allow the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Commander Preble, of the United States Navy, the amount he would have been entitled to had he not been discharged from the service. Commander Preble, being a captain in the Navy, was promoted by the President to the rank of commander, to date from July 16, 1862. He was then in service in the Gulf—I think in command of a vessel blockading Mobile. Before his commission reached him, for an offense for which the Secretary of the Navy thought adequate, he was removed from the Navy. Subsequently, and while he was laboring under this disability, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, with full knowledge of the facts, and upon representation made to President Lincoln, he was renominated as commander in the Navy, his nomination to date back and take effect from the time of his original nomination. He was nominated on the 21st of February, 1863, to be commander, or to be promoted—for that was the effect of the nomination—as from the 16th of July, 1862. He was removed by order of the Secretary of the Navy on the 12th of October, 1862.

Now, the committee believe—in fact they understood from the gentleman who made a representation of the case to the President—that Mr. Lincoln intended in the renomination of this officer, despite his removal by the Secretary of the Navy, that it should date from the time of his original promotion, and that such was the contemplation of law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The gentleman is always able to take care of himself.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not wish to take the floor; only to ask a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When I am in the discharge of the duty of reporting a case from a committee I prefer to state my case fully and then answer any interrogatories that may be put to me by any member of the House. It will be observed by the House, upon this statement of facts, that when this officer was reinstated, though he was out of the naval service to be sure for about six months, to wit, from the 12th of October, 1862, to the 21st of February, 1863, his reappointment was to date back as of his original rank.

Now, if I understand the argument of the gentleman, and I feel the speciousness of it if not its force, an officer who was not doing naval service is not entitled to the pay of a naval officer. But it was stated before the committee—I think it came from the proper Department; at any rate the proof was before the committee from officers of the Navy—that in case of an officer being retired by the action of a board and afterwards being reinstated, the original rank and pay dates back to the time of the retirement. At any rate there are cases where special legislation has been had in this way.

Now, it seemed to the committee clear that the intention of the President was to condone the offense for which he was removed and wipe it out as if there was no such offense as justified his removal, and it seemed clear to us that the President renominated him as of the date of his removal.

This bill would draw from the Treasury about $1,600 as pay for a commanding officer waiting orders. Though it may be of no special consequence in this case, I will state that this officer has since proved to be a very valuable one to the naval arm of the service. During the war he organized and commanded the corps of Marines who led the assault upon Fort Fisher under the bombardment of our fleet. The amount involved is small and it seemed to the committee that they were following the precedent in such case and carrying out the intention of the President and of the law in reporting this bill. With this statement I leave the matter with the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If my friend will permit me—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no control of the floor now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman had permitted me to ask a question it would have obviated the necessity of saying what I propose to say. I did not desire to interrupt the gentleman's argument, but to suggest to him at the point upon which he was then speaking, that it must be treated as if there was no removal at all. The President having put this officer back where he was before, it was in substance no removal; and the question I desired to ask the gentleman was, why was it necessary to come here and ask Congress to pass this bill to pay him if he really was in the Navy and entitled to pay? Why could not the proper accounting officers of the Government pay him his salary? There seems to be something wrong in regard to it. His reasoning seems to fail entirely, because if his reasoning were correct there would be no necessity for an application to pay him for services which it is not contended that he ever rendered the Government.

Now, sir, as I remember this case, this man was dismissed from the Navy by the Secretary of the Navy on grounds which he deemed sufficient, and which I believe the country concurred in at the time, and he was out of the service. But the usual pressure was brought to bear on our good and lamented Chief Magistrate and he finally restored him; and now, after having been out of the service for six months, he is not satisfied with being restored to the service and taking his pay from the time of his reappointment, and he comes here and asks us to pay him for the time that he was out of the service.

Now, I think this is drawing it rather steep, and I think the House will never consent to the adoption of this principle. Where will it stop? Is there a member of Congress here who does not know cases in the military service where men have been dismissed the service and afterward restored? But has there been a single case in which the Government has paid the officer dismissed for the time that he was out of the service? I do not know of a single case, and I do not think the gentleman from Connecticut can show me a case where the Government has paid money under these circumstances.

I think, sir, that we should be establishing a most dangerous precedent, and I trust the House will ponder over the question before they establish it.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask one or two questions for the purpose of obtaining some information. In the first place, I would like to know whether, as a general rule, officers draw their pay from the date of their commissions or from the time of actual service. I am informed that the date of the muster is the time. I asked the question because I really did not know how it was.

I would ask further whether in this particular instance the pay is to date from the time of the remission of the sentence or of the new appointment made by the President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Perhaps the gentleman will allow me to make the motion, and then he can speak to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I am charged by the Committee on Naval Affairs with the duty of reporting this bill to the House, of course the gentleman will see very readily that I cannot consent, so far as I am concerned, to any motion that would interfere with the present consideration and passage of the bill, but having reported it to the House, it is for the House to say what disposition they will make of it, either proceed to action upon it or refer it to some more appropriate committee.

In deference to the suggestion of the gentleman, however, I shall refrain from moving the previous question on the passage of the bill, and the gentleman can test the sense of the House on his motion. Before, however, I surrender the floor for that purpose, I will answer, as far as I can, the questions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I think that if he had followed my first statement, he would have found it unnecessary to make such inquiries.

He asks whether the action of the President in nominating the applicant in this case a second time to this rank was understood to be or intended to be a reversal of the sentence or whether it was in the nature of an original appointment. That is a matter for each gentleman to decide for himself.

The fact is merely that an officer in the Navy was nominated for promotion and confirmed. That fact having taken place another fact occurred, and that is that he was removed by order of the Secretary of the Navy. And then there is a third fact, the rescission of the sentence or reappointment.

Now, some men may consider that an original appointment. It is such upon the face of it; but the committee came to the conclusion, from the fact that he was appointed as of the same date of his original appointment, and from the fact that the case was presented to the President, that it was intended by the President to reverse the decision of the Secretary of the Navy, as it does in point of fact, and in contemplation of law it must have been intended to be a condonation of any offense, real or supposed, for which he was removed by the Secretary.

In regard to the motion which will be made to refer this bill to the Committee of Claims, I will only say that the Committee on Naval Affairs found this matter before them by the decision of this House. They do not claim jurisdiction over this matter, except so far as the House gives them jurisdiction. This bill came to us from the Senate. In that body it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which committee reported it back to the Senate for action. I do not know that I am quite parliamentary in referring to the action of that body. But it is apparent from the records that such were the facts, and therefore it may not be unparliamentary for me to refer to them. The bill passed the Senate, and came to this House. The bill was referred by the House to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which committee after investigation instructed me to report it back to the House, as I have done. It is for the House to determine what action it will take in reference to it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not make the motion to refer this bill to the Committee of Claims from any feeling of hostility to the bill. It may be just, or it may be unjust. But by referring it to the Committee of Claims, which committee will have charge of all such claims, we will secure uniformity of action. However able or honest the committee may be that have reported this bill they have not charge of claims of this kind. They have reported this bill, and the Committee of Claims may report against a dozen bills of the same kind. Now we want uniformity of action in matters of this kind. Let us have the advice of the committee that have charge of all such matters so that all our bills may be treated alike. I therefore move that this bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. PIKE. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] will not prevail, because I do not see how the Committee of Claims can develop by their action any new facts to be presented to this House. Whether it would have been proper originally to have sent this bill to the Committee of Claims; instead of to the Committee on Naval Affairs, is not now to be decided by the House. It was sent to the Naval Committee; they have examined and ascertained the facts in the case, and the bill has been reported to the House by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BRANDEGEE,] as the organ of the committee. Now, it seems to me to be entirely unnecessary to send this bill to another committee to decide upon the facts of the case.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Perhaps the Committee of Claims may develop no new facts. But they will report under the rule which has been established by that committee for their government. At the last session we defeated a bill here which everybody admitted was a meritorious one, simply because it came from the Committee on Appropriations instead of the Committee of Claims; at least that was one of the arguments used against the bill. Now, let this bill go to the Committee of Claims, and let them report whether they are in favor of it under the rules that have governed them and the action of this House in connection with such subjects. The Naval Committee have nothing to do with making appropriations to pay claims merely because the claimant happened to be a naval officer, who was dismissed from the service and afterward restored. They might just as well say they have charge of the claims of men who have been in the military service. It is not at all within the line of duty prescribed for the Naval Committee by this House.

Mr. PIKE. The position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] may be correct, if it should appear that the Committee of Claims have established a rule in relation to the payment of claims similar to this. But I do not understand that there are any of the claims pending before the Committee of Claims, or any other committee of the House, which is similar in character to this.

Now, this report from the Committee on Naval Affairs simply provides that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall examine and award under the rule now established by the House in this case. It does not fix any amount to be paid, that is for the accounting officers to determine. It makes no appropriation of money, but simply provides that the accounting officers under this rule shall give to the applicant in this case whatever may be due to him during this period of his suspension. It would seem that the suspension was ordered by the Secretary, and subsequently removed by the President. Under these circumstances I hope the bill will not be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SCOFIELD; it was agreed to—ayes 62, noes 35.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN GRAY.

Mr. McINDOE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, a bill (H. R. No. 835) for the relief of John Gray; and the bill was laid on the table.

CHARLES M. RAYMOND.

Mr. McINDOE also, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, submitted an adverse report upon the petition of Charles M. Raymond for a pension; which was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question, and submit the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the House adjourn on Thursday, the 20th instant, they adjourn to meet on Thursday, the 3d day of January next.

In offering this resolution I will simply say that if we are to take a recess for the holidays, we had better agree upon the time as soon as practicable, so that gentlemen may know what we shall do and regulate their arrangements accordingly.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope this resolution will not be adopted. I move that it be laid on the table.

On the motion, there were—ayes 45, noes 93.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 112, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blow, Bromwell, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cullom, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Garfield, Abner C. So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the call for a moment till I can make a statement to the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I must insist on the call for the previous question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call the attention of the House to the fact that this resolution proposes to vote away one sixth of the whole session.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the call for the previous question.

On seconding the call for the previous question, there were—ayes 75, noes 36.

Mr. MORRILL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MORRILL and Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes ninety; noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a question of order. I want to know whether it is in order now to move to amend the proposition so as to provide for an adjournment sine die. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MORRILL. Is it in order to move to postpone the further consideration of this subject?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it in order to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The main question was ordered; which was upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 58, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Washburn, Winfield, and Wright—34.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CRAWFORD KEYS AND OTHERS.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House copies of all official documents, orders, letters, and papers of every description in his possession relative to the trial by a military commission and conviction of Crawford Keys and others for the murder of Emory Smith and others; also, in relation to the respite in the case of said Crawford Keys or either of his associates, and their transfer to Fort Delaware and subsequent release on a writ of habeas corpus.

NEW ORLEANS RIOT.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, from the select committee on the New Orleans riot, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to this House any information in the War Department in reference to the riot at New Orleans on the 20th of July last, including any telegraphic dispatches sent or received, and all the reports and testimony of military commissions in the possession of the Department.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. CULLOM, leave of absence was granted to his colleague, Mr. Cook.

COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. BROMWELL. The Committee on Patents was passed over without my knowledge, although I was ready to make report from that committee.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the committee be considered as not having been passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Gentlemen on other committees could never consent to that.

Mr. MYERS. I have always understood when a gentleman makes a statement like that of my colleague on the committee it is taken, and the committee is again called by the Chair. I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is not a question of order. It is when a gentleman makes the statement his vote has been overlooked that the statement is taken.

Mr. STEVENS. This committee will be called again after the holidays.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Agriculture is in the same condition, having been passed over.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order. The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CULLOM in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 876, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first time for information, and then the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For public binding, $450,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out "public binding" and insert "paper for the public printing." It is to correct a mistake made in the estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Southeast Executive Building, including the extension:

For fuel, light, and labor, $23,000.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move to strike that out. I simply desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what that covers? It will be recollected that at the last session we appropriated over a hundred thousand dollars for furnishing and improving the Executive Mansion. Now it is proposed to appropriate $23,000, making an appropriation of over one hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars for furnishing and improving the Executive Mansion. It seems to me we are called upon to exercise economy on these expenditures. We should at least look into them.

Mr. STEVENS. The appropriation asked for is for the Treasury building and not for the Executive Mansion.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Not the Mansion? Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the following item:

For rendering the Marine Hospital, at Louisville, Kentucky, habitable, $10,000.

This is a bill for supplying deficiencies, and certainly this is no deficiency, and I doubt the propriety of the appropriation anyhow for several good and sufficient reasons. In the first place, we passed a law at the last session of Congress giving to the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to sell hospitals of this character, and providing for the care of sick seamen and boatmen in another way much cheaper and better. I hope there will be no objection to striking this item out. If there is anything wanted let the subject be brought in properly and sent to the Committee on Commerce, who will give it their consideration.

Mr. STEVENS. We did pass a law for the sale of most of the marine hospitals; but we unfortunately left the matter to the discretion of the Department to say which. I think, however, it is not worth considering, and therefore I shall not object.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to hear from the member from the Louisville district [Mr. ROUSSEAU] whether this is necessary. If it be necessary I will vote for it. But I do not know whether it is or not.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to strike out the item was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

Mr. HALE. I would like to inquire for what purpose this sum of $40,000 is to be expended, and for that purpose I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. STEVENS. At the time Congress authorized the company to construct a telegraph line from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, very much against my sense of right, it ordered the Government to pay every year a subsidy of $40,000 for the period of ten years, I believe, from the date of the original grant, which will be for eight years to come. Last year, by a supposed inadvertence—I have never been very anxious to put these appropriations in at any time, and did not look very sharp for it—we left out the appropriation. On referring to the law again I find there is no way of getting around it. By the contract made with the company the debt is due and ought to be paid. Hence we have put it in this deficiency bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the gentlemen whether we have not been passing bills during the last session of Congress granting privileges to these companies, and giving them extensive grants of land on condition that they should furnish to the Government of the United States telegraph facilities, and to this company among others.

Mr. STEVENS. We did not grant any land to this company at all. There were several companies that got grants of land from Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT. I mean railroad companies.

Mr. STEVENS. There was no legislation whatever in regard to this company at the last session.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For a deficiency for work done, or being done by the corporation of Washington city, in front of and across Government property, under act of May 5, 1864, as per estimate of city surveyor in letter to the mayor of said city, accompanying estimate of Commissioner of Public Buildings, $170,587.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. This appropriation is not in order. The privilege was reserved when the bill was introduced to take exceptions on points of order in committee. This appropriation is in accordance with no law, I believe, and hence it is out of order here.

Mr. STEVENS. It is in accordance with a law passed by Congress some years ago, by which the Government was ordered to pay for one half of the improvements of this kind which were to be made by the corporation of the city of Washington when the same had been adjusted, where the Government owned the property on one side. That is this case. The law was passed years ago, and the estimate, unless there is some mistake in it, is right. Last year we appropriated a sum for another portion of this work. The estimate has been made and filed and the General Government is asked to pay its proportion. It was put in the general appropriation bill and was then stricken out in order to have a regular estimate made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This whole question was up, very nearly in this shape, at the last session of Congress as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations may recollect, and there was found to be no law justifying an appropriation of this kind, and I think the chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled it out of order. It is a proposition which should come from the Committee for the District of Columbia. It has no business in this bill and I think it ought to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to strike out the paragraph. I am not disposed, upon the information that we have, to vote for this city of Washington an appropriation of $170,000. I call for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS and WASHBURNE, of Illinois, were appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to state, before the question is taken, that this proposition was reported last year by the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to strike out in lines seventy-six, seventy-seven, and seventy-eight the words "in all the sum of $35,864 67." There seems to be a surplus of language there.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to add to the bill the following:

For payment of O. W. Barnes for lumber and carpenter's work for Indian service, Joco reservation, in the year 1861, $1,400.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I must make a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. Let me make a brief explanation. This item was included in an appropriation made by the Senate last session, which was stricken out in the House on the ground that it ought to pertain to a deficiency bill and not to an appropriation bill. The Secretary says that that is the only reason why this item was stricken out, that the vouchers are in the Department, that the claim is correct, and that they only lack the money to satisfy it. I know that this individual is an honest carpenter who performed the work.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I shall have to insist on my point of order for the purpose of doing what the gentleman from Ohio has generally heretofore aided me in, keeping private claims out of appropriation bills.

Mr. SPALDING. I will ask the Clerk to read a few lines from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This may be a very just claim, and if the gentleman will bring it in as a private bill, I shall probably aid him in passing it through the House, but I hope that my friend from Ohio, who has been heretofore very strict in these matters and to whom the country is much indebted, will not press such a proposition as this.

Mr. SPALDING. If I move to put it in a different shape, and increase the sum to $40,000, then the gentleman's objection would fall. But it was to relieve the bill from that large appropriation that I put the amendment in this shape. This man must either be paid in this way, or there must be an appropriation of $40,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been raised, the Chair will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] what law there is which provides for this appropriation.

Mr. SPALDING. The law providing for the Indian service.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is certainly a private claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] states that the amendment he has proposed is in pursuance of some existing law.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is customary when this point is raised for the party offering the amendment to show the law which justifies it.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] will not dispute that there is law for making appropriations for the Indian service.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That may be. But I dispute that there is any law upon the statute-book for the relief of this man.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that unless the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] can show some specific law for this appropriation the amendment must be ruled out of order.

Mr. SPALDING. I will modify my amendment so that it will read "to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to supply the deficiency for the payment of," &c.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That does not change the original proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the modification does not change the character of the amendment so as to bring it within the rule of the House. The Chair therefore rules the amendment out of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of State:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, $250,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to strike out the clause just read. I have heard it said that this $250,000 was wanted to compel Surratt to come home until he shall be pardoned, or some such thing as that. [Laughter.] They do not want to send the pardon over to Europe, for the pardon agents do not do business in foreign countries as yet. [Renewed laughter.] I do not know how it is, but I have heard that statement made, in the way of burlesque, perhaps. Now, I think that before we make this appropriation we should have some explanation of it.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to ask the gentleman for the author of the statement to which he has referred. The question of my colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] is a very proper one, and I have no doubt it was put in a very proper spirit, as it certainly was put in very proper language. [Laughter.] I will explain this appropriation; and it may gratify the curiosity of some persons to know one or two things that took place in reference to it.

When this appropriation was requested by the Secretary of State, being a larger amount than that Department ever asked for before—and I will say here that the committee have always agreed that the State Department had been managed more economically than any other Department of the Government—I did not feel disposed to recommend it either to the committee or to the House without knowing the reason for it. Not being very well, I requested the Secretary of State, he being a young man, [laughter,] to call and explain it to me, which he did with great courtesy. And I may as well say to gentlemen now, for they may want to know, that we did not talk about anything except this appropriation. [Laughter.] He convinced me not only that this sum was wanted for useful purposes, but that it would finally be found to be too small.

I will mention some of the items for which it is needed. One or two of them perhaps I shall not mention because they better not get into print. But I will mention enough to satisfy the House, I think, of the propriety of this appropriation. We have pending in various countries of Europe, mainly in England and France, a very large number of suits to recover confederate property from those who claim to be the owners of that property in those countries. The Government has been obliged, of course, in every case to employ counsel. The amount of money involved is considerably more than twenty million dollars. It is the opinion of the Department, an opinion justified by the advice of eminent counsel, that, if the claims be properly prosecuted, a very large proportion of this amount may be recovered. I of course am not able to give an opinion on the subject; but this is the opinion of the Department. Now, in reference to the employment of counsel to prosecute these claims, we know that in England there are three classes of lawyers, solicitors, counselors, and advocates, all of whom have to be fed to a very large amount. Besides that, according to the practice in that country, the attorney must be indemnified for the costs which may accrue in case he fails in the suit. Supposing our claims to this amount, $20,000,000, to be well founded, I submit that an appropriation of $250,000 is but a small amount to be expended in the recovery of so large a sum. This is one item, perhaps the largest; and this money must be furnished immediately, or the suits must be abandoned.

I may state that in the case of Surratt, referred to by my colleague, the expenses have been larger, perhaps, than would be desirable. Surratt has been pursued for a year; he has been followed all over the continent of Europe and in the East, and this pursuit has involved very large expenses. Although the amount expended in the pursuit and arrest of Surratt is large, yet if he shall be finally brought to justice I shall consider the money well expended. Nay, we have an ample return for all the expenditures in the demonstration of the fact that no place in the wide world affords to so great a malefactor a refuge from the avenging hand of justice.

But, sir, besides the expense already incurred, it is necessary to have money to bring several witnesses here, as well as to bring home the culprit. In reference to the employment of a vessel for this purpose, I may state one fact of which I was not until recently aware: when the Department of State, having no control over the Navy, orders a national vessel upon any expedition of this kind without an appropriation for the purpose by Congress, the Navy Department charges the expense to the Department of State; and the present Secretary of the Navy, very properly I believe, holds the latter to a strict account, and requires the payment of the money as much as if it were a private transaction.

In this connection, I may state that the expense of transporting the queen of the Sandwich Islands in a vessel of the United States was charged in the same way to the State Department by the Navy Department. Gentlemen may think that such an expenditure was not judicious; but perhaps if gentlemen knew the struggle and rivalry which were going on between England and our Government in reference to that matter they might change their opinions.

The State Department has also been compelled to bear the expense of the expedition to Mexico. There are other items which I might name; but I have now said more perhaps than is necessary. I feel it due to the administration of that Department to go as far as may be prudent in voting the appropriations asked for it; and however I may differ politically with the head of that Department, I cannot allow myself to be influenced by such considerations in acting upon a question of this kind.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The explanation of my colleague is, in general, satisfactory; but he says that there are some "other items;" and knowing his partiality toward the Administration and his recent intimacy with it, I do not know but that among those "other items" may be one to pay the expenses of "swinging round the circle." If the gentleman will assure us that there is nothing of that kind among the reserved items I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I assure the gentleman that there is nothing of that kind included in this appropriation. There are two or three unpaid bills of that account, [laughter,] but it is expressly understood that they shall not come out of this appropriation.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to amend by adding the following:

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to pay three watchmen employed in the Smithsonian grounds for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, the sum of $2,475 is hereby appropriated.

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to pay to the watchmen mentioned in the fifth section of the act appropriating for sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, the difference between their pay as fixed prior to the passage of that act and the allowance made by said section, $2,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. STEVENS. I will explain the reason for offering this amendment. These employes have been engaged under the authority of a law passed at the last session; but in that act we omitted to make any appropriation whatever for their payment. The Department has, therefore, decided that these men cannot be paid out of any fund now at its disposal.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURTIS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 876, making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say one word in reference to the amendment of the committee striking out the following:

For a deficiency for work done, or being done by the corporation of Washington city, in front of and across Government property, under act of May 5, 1864, as per estimate of city surveyor in letter to the mayor of said city, accompanying estimate of Commissioner of Public Buildings, $170,587.

I know it is out of order to speak of what occurred in committee, but gentlemen acknowledged in going through the tellers they did not understand what they were voting on, and they would vote on, the strongest side. I want to say that this expenditure was authorized by the act of 1864; that a part of the money has already been expended, and the other part is in the process of expenditure. I hope the appropriation will be passed and the debt paid off. Last year it was reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia. Unless some gentleman wishes to make some remarks, I shall call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I confess the explanation of my friend from Pennsylvania is not satisfactory to me, for the reason I want to know something more about this matter than we have. Are we to pass an appropriation of $170,000 with no report of a committee, no explanation of the law, no facts upon which we can base an opinion as to whether the work has been properly done?

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will call his attention to the estimates, pages 3 and 4.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This statement here does not satisfy me at all. It is a statement made by the surveyor of Washington city, a man whom I do not know. He addresses a communication to the mayor of the city of Washington; this, of itself, shows the loose way in which we are legislating, in which we are voting away the money of the people.

The first item is for constructing sewers in front of Government reservations on Pennsylvania avenue, between Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets west, and also between Twentieth and Twenty-First streets west, $5,000. Well, sir, what is the evidence the amount has been paid, or at what rate or to whom it has been paid?

Another item is, "for constructing sewer in Seventeenth street west, between Pennsylvania avenue and the canal, in front of Government reservation, $14,688."

It does not state when it was done. I will read the first part of the communication:

SURVEYOR'S OFFICE, CITY HALL,
WASHINGTON, D. C., October 13, 1866.

SIR: I herewith furnish a statement of the character and cost of the work done and now being done by the corporation in front and across Government property, for which appropriations ought to be made, under section three, approved May 5, 1864.

I wish the House to notice the language of this communication by an unauthorized officer, a man who has nothing to do with the Government, a simple surveyor of the city of Washington, "for work done and now being done." It is not a liquidated matter as the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to suppose. They come here and ask us to pay them not only for what has been done but for what they may do hereafter. Here are other items:

For constructing sewer on fourth street west, from Indiana avenue to G street north, in front of Judiciary square, $4,000.

For constructing sewer in H street north, between Vermont and Connecticut avenues, in front of La Fayette square, $3,000.

For constructing sewer in I street north, between thirteenth and fourteenth streets west, in front of Franklin square, $2,000.

For constructing sewer in New York avenue, between Tenth and Twelfth streets west, in front of Government reservations, $2,400.

Then we have, for laying flag footways and paving gutters on the north and south sides of Pennsylvania avenue, from First street east to Eleventh street east, the enormous sum of $56,000. To whom has that money gone, or to whom is it to go?

Mr. DELANO. Let me call the gentleman's attention to what I understand to be the law regulating this matter. By the act of May 5, 1864, I believe there is provision made substantially in this form: that the Government shall pay such proportion of this expense as the Government's property compares with the other property of the city; and in order to know whether the sum charged to the Government is correct or not there should be an examination into the relative value of the Government property and other property benefited by these improvements. I do not discover there has been any such comparison, and it may be that the Government has been left to pay the entire amount.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the view the gentleman takes is correct. The surveyor seems to charge the whole amount to the Government. I submit, then, whether we are willing to vote the appropriation. I for one am not.

Mr. GARFIELD. Have we Government property enough between the streets mentioned to authorize this appropriation to be made?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he has ever heard of such an officer in this city as the city treasurer or the city auditor. I have been here a number of years and have legislated in company with the gentleman considerably upon matters pertaining to the city, and I for one have never heard of such an officer as city treasurer or auditor, nor have I ever seen any reports in the newspapers coming from such an officer, nor do I know—perhaps it is my fault—anything about the administration of the finances of this city, what becomes of the funds, and who is responsible for them. I have heard that this whole matter of the control of the funds is in the hands of the mayor, and that it is sometime paid out upon his order simply, precisely as an individual pays out his own money. I will not vouch for the truth of this, but I did not know but the gentleman from Pennsylvania had heard of such officers and could tell us what particular functions they discharge. Inasmuch as we are responsible for so much of the legislation in relation to the city of Washington, I thought it proper in connection with this large appropriation to make this inquiry.

Mr. STEVENS rose.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to say one word with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The committee felt themselves bound by the acts of Congress on this subject. This claim on the part of the City of Washington has been accruing for a series of years. I recollect distinctly that last year we rejected a portion of this very claim, but by doing so we only put off the evil day. The amount has been accumulating upon our hands, and just so long as this law is continued in existence which requires Congress to appropriate money to the extent of one half of those improvements opposite public squares and other property belonging to the Government we shall be obliged to pay it. Now, my opinion as one member of the committee is that we had better pay off the debt as it now exists, and repeal all the laws on the subject.

Mr. DAWES. Had we not better repeal the laws before we pay the debt?

Mr. SPALDING. I am as reluctant to pay these claims as any member of this House, but I do not see any way of escape. If we postpone it we will only put an additional burden upon the next Congress.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have here the act under which this appropriation is made. It is the act of May 5, 1864, the third section of which is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which the streets, avenues, or alleys of the said city pass through or by any of the property of the United States, the Commissioner of Public Buildings shall pay to the duly authorized officer of the corporation the just proportion of the expense incurred in improving such avenue, street, or alley which the said property bears to the whole cost thereof, to be ascertained in the same manner as the sum apportioned among individual proprietors of the property improved thereby.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL] who is to determine upon the propriety of the improvements, upon the amount of expense, and when contracts are fulfilled. Let us have a little light on the internal affairs of this city if we are to appropriate such enormous sums for its improvement. Let us stop and ascertain where the money goes and through what channel. Let us know who is responsible. I for one will not be backward while I occupy a seat here in liberal appropriations for the District of Columbia, but I think it is high time we have some responsibility in the disbursement. It may be that that responsibility exists, but it is quite important for the character of the administration of affairs in this city that it be made manifest that it does exist, for according to my information there is no responsibility in anybody; one man holds the money, makes contracts, pays whom he pleases, decides himself whether it is fair, audits his own account, squares it, strikes a balance, and when he is out of money calls for more. It is not proper for us to make these large appropriations in this manner for the District of Columbia if such a state of things exists. It does not result in any improvement. It is a sure way not to have an improvement, and a quite sure way to deplete the Treasury. The moral effect upon the District is bad, and I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] who is responsible for the morals of the District of Columbia that it is high time for him to look into the matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman states that a portion of the claim for which this appropriation is asked has been accruing for a number of years past. He made no statement, so far as I heard, as to the time when the work was done.

Now, according to my recollection, there was during the last session of Congress a claim presented in behalf of the city of Washington, which was referred to the Committee of Claims, asking an appropriation of about fifty thousand dollars to pay for work which had been done by the city during the last twenty years. A report favorable to that claim was made by that committee, or authorized to be made; whether it became a law or not, I am unable to say. I had supposed that when we paid that $50,000 for work done during the last twenty years, it would settle the account between the Government and the city for that old work. But I understand now that this claim comes again before Congress for back work that has been done perhaps twenty years ago. I cordially concur in the suggestion which has been made that it would be well, if it were possible, for the Government to get a final settlement of these claims, yet I doubt that we shall be able to do it, and that if this appropriation is made and made in the form of paying for work under the law of 1864, in such form as to carry the impression to every member that the work has been performed since 1864, we shall still have, session after session, large claims presented by this city for work done no one knows when, no one knows by whom or how performed.

I believe that the true course to be adopted is that no further claims of this nature shall be paid until some investigation has been made and a report has been submitted by some authorized person; so that we may know what basis there is for these claims of the city against the Government. Let us have a final settlement and commence the account anew.

For that reason I am opposed to voting these large sums of money without any explanation of what they are paid for or to whom they are to be paid.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not wish to be understood as vouching for the correctness of the particular estimate under consideration. I only desired to have the law read that members might understand the relations that the Government of the United States bears to the city government in reference to these improvements. I am as much opposed as anybody upon this floor to the passage of any claim, come from whatever source it may, that has not been carefully considered by the proper committee, whether it comes from the District of Columbia or from any other section of the country.

Now, in response to my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who assumes that I am responsible for the morals of this city, I have this to say: that I protest against being held responsible for the morals of the city of Washington while Congress is in session. [Laughter.] During the recess I have no objection to taking that responsibility.

Mr. DELANO. Prior to 1864 there was no law regulating the manner of dividing the expense of improving the city between the property of the Government and the property of individuals, and up to that time there was always a large claim against the Government for its proportion of the expense of those improvements. That claim has been alluded to by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.] It was presented to the Committee of Claims last session, and after being largely reduced, a bill was reported in favor of what the committee was willing to allow, and that bill is now pending.

Now, under the law of 1864, there is a rule by which these expenses shall be apportioned, but whether this proposed appropriation covers those old claims I do not know.

Mr. SPALDING. My supposition is that this includes the very claim to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. DELANO. Well, if that is so, how improper it is for us to act on it; and it was because I saw that under the vagueness of this appropriation it might be made to accomplish that that I directed the attention of the House to the law on this subject.

Now, sir, the old claim ought to stand upon its own merits. Notwithstanding a portion of the claim has received the sanction of a committee, still it deserves the further examination and attention of the House before it is adopted. It ought not to be provided for in this bill without the House investigating it.

I think that subsequent claims for the improvement of the streets and avenues of Washington which are made against the Government ought to be thoroughly scrutinized by the Committee for the District of Columbia so that the House may act intelligently when it is called to pass upon those claims; I mean such claims as shall arise under the law of 1864. In the present form of this proposed appropriation, when it is not certain whether it is for the old claims that are yet to be acted upon by the House or for new claims, it seems to me it should not be made without some further examination.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I would ask the gentleman if the items as read from the report are the items which were included in the claims upon which the Committee of Claims acted during the last session? My impression is that the sewer on Fourteenth street and the work on Pennsylvania avenue in the one are the same as in the other.

Mr. DELANO. That would be my impression. I listened, or tried to listen, when the items were read, but I could not feel sufficiently certain about it to assert the fact. There was a large item for sewerage in the claim, but whether it was for this particular sewerage I am unable to say.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say a word or two upon this subject. Last year we had some considerable difficulty about work done some twenty years ago, under an old law by which the Government took back certain land that had been granted to the city. The claim was at first rejected, but finally the sum agreed upon was paid.

The act of 1864 was passed; under that act this work was done. The Government has agreed to pay for the work according to its proportion of the property that is affected by it. Our Commissioner of Public Buildings was charged with the examination of the claim, and this appropriation is to enable him to pay it. It may be that this allowance is too large. I am entirely willing that it should be examined. And I like the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] that some committee should take up and finally settle the accounts between the Government and the city of Washington. And in the hope that such a motion will be made by some gentleman, I shall not ask for a separate vote on this amendment, but allow the vote to be taken upon all the amendments together, unless some gentleman desire to have a separate vote on some one or more of them.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire a separate vote of the House upon the amendment striking out the appropriation for the Marine Hospital at Louisville, Kentucky. It is true that at the last session Congress ordered certain hospitals to be sold. But the one at Louisville has not been sold, and I am assured that the appropriation here asked for is necessary in order to enable the Government to derive advantage from the use of that hospital. It is an important one, and I trust the amendment of the Committee of the Whole will not be concurred in.

Mr. SPALDING. I will ask for a separate vote upon concurring in the amendment striking out the appropriation for Washington city.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first amendment, upon which Mr. ROUSSEAU asked for a separate vote, was to strike out the following:

For rendering the Marine Hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, habitable, $10,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say a few words as to my reasons for moving in Committee of the Whole to strike out this clause.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered, no debate is now in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object to any further debate.

The question was then taken upon concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 45.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ROUSSEAU called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROUSSEAU and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 56, noes 54.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ROUSSEAU called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken: and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 55, not voting, 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Bingham, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Reader W. NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawson, Deffrees, Denison, Eldridge, Fink, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, John H. Rice, Schenck, Starr, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—56.

So the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The next question is upon the amendment striking out the appropriation for work done by the corporation of Washington city. On this amendment the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has demanded a separate vote.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out lines fifty-two to fifty-eight, inclusive, as follows:

For a deficiency of work done, or being done by the corporation of Washington city, in front of and across Government property, under act of May 5, 1864, as per estimate of city surveyor in letter to the mayor of said city, accompanying estimate of Commissioner of Public Buildings, $170,587.

Mr. SPALDING. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] consents to the striking out of this item. I therefore withdraw my demand for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is upon concurring in this and the remaining amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and proceed to the consideration of the President's annual message.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. WENTWORTH was entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH,] who is entitled to the floor, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the country has spoken; the popular verdict stands recorded in the recent elections; and the Thirty-Ninth Congress reassembles strengthened, encouraged, and instructed by the great tribunal to which it appealed, the loyal people of the United States.

Great admonitions flow from this result. The President is admonished that his "policy" of reconstruction is not indorsed by the people who put down the rebellion and saved the Republic; that his denunciations of the legislative branch of the Government, in which he charges them with revolutionary designs, with striving to prevent the reunion of the States, with hanging upon the verge of the Government, and with being a "tyrannical, domineering, and unconstitutional Congress," are not approved; that his reorganizing the rebellion into pretended State governments in the disloyal States, and insisting that they are legal State organizations and entitled to representation in Congress, without affording any security or protection to the loyal men in those States, and in defiance and contempt of the law-making power of the Government and the representatives of the people; that his indiscriminate pardon of rebels, his failure to bring any of them to punishment for the most infamous of crimes, his sustaining the murder of Union men in New Orleans, and his failure to give any protection to the loyal whites and the freedmen of the South who are shot down in the streets and murdered in their beds at night for the sole offense of faithfulness to the Government of their fathers, his refusal to bring any of those murderers to punishment for their crimes; that his relieving rebel property from the confiscation that the law imposes; diverting the public money to create illegal State organizations and to pay officers of his own creation in violation of law; that his attempt by the use of the vast patronage confided to him for a wise purpose to sap the independence of Congress, and, failing in that, to corrupt and debauch the people, the sources of power, by removing from office men, whether they had borne arms in the defense of the country and had come back scarred and maimed from the grandest battle-fields in history or not, who sustained the integrity and independence of Congress, and substituting in their place the creatures of his will, some of whom were men whose hands were stained with the blood of heroes shed in the nation's behalf; and his manifest contempt, in his appointments to offices, of the "advice and consent of the Senate" of the United States; that his opposition to the just and wise constitutional amendments proposed by Congress for adoption by the States, and thereby encouraging a spirit in the South against a speedy restoration to peace and prolonging the time of adjustment and pacification; in short, that nearly his whole conduct, official and unofficial, from his 4th of March presentation to his gyrations "round the circle," have received from the people to whom he so confidently appealed the strongest condemnation, the most withering rebuke.

And those mercenary men who, without principle and devoid of honor, for the sake of plunder followed the standard of their apostate chief into the camp of the traitors; they are admonished by the result that the contempt and scorn of all honest men will be their portion as long as they shall live! Have these worthless sensibility enough left to appreciate the "situation," or is the result as to them like "casting pearls before swine?"

But, Mr. Chairman, the admonition does not stop here; it comes with tremendous force to the Congress of the United States. You have done well, say the people, but you have not done enough. Eight months you stood on guard to keep traitors from the high places of power; you proposed needed changes in the Constitution, passed the "Freedmen's Bureau" and "civil rights bills," and recognized the loyal people of the State of Tennessee as entitled to representation in Congress—all that was well, but we require you to do more. And, Mr. Chairman, I believe that this grand and sublime manifestation of the popular will has a far deeper significance. While it approves of what has been done, it decides that the work is still incomplete; it indicates that at last, after passing through centuries of contest and blood, combating with thrones and despots, with false systems, political and religious; with persecution, ignorance, and superstition, the great principle should at last be asserted on this continent and ingrafted upon our regenerated nationality, that all men, native-born or naturalized in this country, shall be equal before the law, equal at the ballot-box, equal before man as they are before God.

Who that has watched the terrible ordeal through which we have passed can have failed to discover the superintending protection of Heaven all through the darkness and gloom until our salvation was complete, can now doubt that in this crowning victory at the ballot-box the "voice of the people is the voice of God?"

Sir, the responsibility of rebuilding the shattered column of the national edifice rests upon Congress. All hope of favorable coöperation from the President must be abandoned. To Congress the four million loyal people of the South are looking for protection. Away in their southern homes, or in the mountains and caves to which they have fled for safety, or languishing in dungeons, or suffering in exile, they are offering up their daily prayers to God in our behalf and stretching forth their hands to us for help. The loyal millions who have just spoken at the polls; the silent throng of cripples and mourners that sadden the land; the sacred dead that fell in the struggle; the sacrifices of blood and treasure the country has made; the holy cause of liberty and free government itself, all appeal to us to come up to the high demands of the hour, to do our whole duty, do it promptly, and do it well.

What is that duty? One, sir, that has been too long neglected. I was one of those who believed last session that Congress should then have gone to the root of the matter and reorganize from the foundation. I was in favor, as some honorable gentlemen here well know, of providing by law of Congress for the reorganization of the State governments in all the States that have been in rebellion, except the State of Tennessee, and that in that reorganization all loyal men, irrespective of color, should take part. I still believe that we should have done so; but more timid counsels prevailed. Gentlemen feared that the people were not ready for this, that they had not reached the high stand-point necessary to approve such a course. I hope these gentlemen have learned that the people are ahead of them, that they are radical, that they comprehend the whole question; and, sir, they will insist upon their representatives doing everything that the nation needs.

The most radical men of this Congress are returned by the largest majorities, while all of those in the originally free States, and most of those from the slave, who followed the pernicious example of the President and left the Union party are rejected by the people.

Then away with your timid conservatism; away with that quality that would compromise the right, that would barter away equality, justice, and plighted faith for expediency, trade, and the good-will of traitors. I am sick of your expediency men and measures; the times demand radical men and measures. Radicalism crowded the Mayflower landed on Plymouth rock, dotted settlements along the Atlantic coast, declared "not one cent for tribute, but millions for defense," threw the tea into Boston harbor, made the immortal Declaration, achieved our independence, redeemed this great land from the wilderness, built the school-house and the church, covered the land with cities and towns, and the ocean with ships, stretched the electric cord through the great waters so that continent talked with continent under the sea, sent two million men to the front, crushed out the rebellion, kept traitors out of Congress, repudiated Andrew Johnson, the rebels, and copperheads by more than half a million majority, and now it proposes to reap all the fruits of the great victories of the sword and the ballot-box by reconstructing the Republic upon a sound and just basis so that it will stand forever.

We must be fearless as well as just; we must punish traitors and stand by our friends "though the heavens fall." We have a fearful responsibility to meet; we have not discharged our duty to the ten unreconstructed States. The collapse of the rebellion left those States without civil government and without a "republican form of government." In such an emergency it devolved upon Congress to "guaranty" to them a "republican form of government." This could not be done by proclamation of the Executive or by military orders, but only by law, by solemn acts of legislation of the law-making power of the United States; for it is the highest act of legislation to guaranty and provide civil government for a State.

When the fathers of the Republic founded this unequalled system of government; when in the great councils that they held to frame a Constitution that, in the language of its preamble, "should establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and posterity;" when they were gathering from all ages, all political systems, and all history the materials with which to construct the new edifice that was to be consecrated to those high and noble ends, they with prophetic vision dimly foresaw that the time might come in the nation's life when, through the machinery of State governments, sections, or interests in conflict, real or imaginary, with the policy of the General Government, might seek by revolution to sever the connection of that State or section with the Union, and that in the revolution thus inaugurated all law, all authority, all government, executive, legislative, and judicial, might be overthrown so that the State and people affected thereby would be practically without a republican form of government, and then, with the great wisdom that distinguished all their deliberations, they provided for that contingency and vested the power of reorganizing those States in the national Congress; and while the exercise of this power is new, the power itself is as old as the Constitution. To what else could this constitutional provision refer; the admission of new States and the care of the Territories and other property of the United States are provided for in other sections. It could not relate to anything but the reconstruction of old States that had wandered away from their allegiance and the people of which desired to return to that allegiance.

Again, the great Charter provided for the security to life, liberty, and protection to the rights of property. These are the great ends of the Government they were founding; for these the Revolution was fought, independence achieved, and the Constitution established. And if these rights God given and thus guarantied were denied the people and legislation were needed in the premises, where did the Constitution vest the power thus to legislate? In the very first section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that—

"All legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

And again, in the last subdivision of section eight of the same article, it is provided that Congress shall—

"Make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any Department or officer thereof."

It is submitted, Mr. Chairman, that such legislation can be had by Congress as may be necessary to secure those great ends. Am I told that this is a new construction? If new, then I say that it is time that the Constitution was construed in the interests of liberty and on the side of justice. Slavery, thank God, is abolished. The heresy of "State rights" went down with the monstrous system that gave it birth. This all-controlling influence of human bondage, oppression, and guilt that stalked into legislative halls, made Presidents, made Cabinet ministers, shaped the policy of this country, stood behind power, overshadowed Courts, and put constructions upon the Constitution consistent with its own interest and to perpetuate its own power, no longer.

rules the Government, makes its laws, or writes its judicial opinions.

And now let us construe the Constitution as it was intended by its framers; not to make men slaves, but freemen; not to take life, but to save it; not to rob men of their property, but to secure that property to them; not to deprive them of the liberty of speech and of the press, but to place those rights beyond jeopardy. I think it is clear that Congress has all the needed power to reorganize by law the governments of those States, and it follows that the particular means to be resorted to to effect that object are such as Congress shall determine.

But we are told that those ten States are reorganized, that they have State governments. I am aware that there are rebel machines in the territory recently in rebellion that call themselves States. I am aware that the President has undertaken to galvanize them into States by proclamation, but no good lawyer will for a moment contend that these organizations have any validity as State governments until they are recognized as valid by Congress. They are monstrous systems of fraud, oppression, and murder. They exclude from power all men loyal to the Union. They screen from merited punishment the assassins of ten thousand loyal men who have been butchered in their territory since they "accepted the situation." They deny to Union men and freedmen that which the Constitution guarantees to them. They were erected without the consent of the people, and decided to be without validity by the highest court of North Carolina; and whenever the question comes for final decision before the United States Supreme Court, no doubt can exist but the decision of the North Carolina court will be sustained. They have had the audacity to elect Senators and Representatives to Congress almost exclusively from the leaders of the rebellion, and because they were such leaders and were the most conspicuous in the work of destroying this Government; and those "statesmen," instead of being suspended with a pressure of hemp about their necks, as they richly deserve, are coolly demanding seats in the Congress of the United States.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, we have neglected the duty too long of formally rejecting these creations of treason. We must begin the work anew and provide by law that all male persons in those States aside from the excepted classes of the age of twenty-one years, native-born or naturalized, shall have the right to vote in electing delegates to conventions to frame new State constitutions or amend old ones, in electing State legislative and judicial officers, and all other elections that may occur in the reorganization of these State governments; that no person who has engaged in rebellion shall be eligible to office in the new State organization or in the conventions aforesaid.

The excepted classes are all persons that have held office, civil or military, under the confederacy or in the army or navy thereof; all persons who have been educated at military or naval academies of the United States and afterward engaged in the rebellion; all persons who had once taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and then in any manner engaged in rebellion; all editors, authors, or publishers of any book, pamphlet, paper, or publication that advocated the cause of the rebellion, and all persons who were guerrillas, and persons carrying on war against the Government and not belonging to the regular army of the confederacy and acting under its direct orders.

When the people thus acted and so framed their State constitutions and laws as should secure to all persons permitted, as above, to participate in the work of reorganization, and to all loyal men full political and civil rights, with the ballot as their shield and buckler, and shall disqualify from suffrage and from holding office all the persons and classes above excepted, and when the Legislatures of those new State organizations adopt the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery and the amendments to the Constitution recently proposed by Congress, and shall present Senators and Representatives that can take the congressional oath of admission, then, sir, I would have Congress admit those Senators and Representatives, recognize those State governments as valid, and the work of restoration will be complete.

But, Mr. Chairman, it will be said that I am in favor of universal negro suffrage at the South. Indeed, sir, I am. The ballot is the only protection after all that men have in this country. Take the ballot away from a class and that class will not have equal rights with those who do exercise the ballot. Your civil rights bill is well, necessary, but what avail is it unless it is enforced. Put it into the Constitution as you will, and as you should, but it will be as a rainbow in the cloud to the oppressed people of the South without there is some power there to enforce it; beautiful to look upon, but giving no warmth or light, it "will hold the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope."

We have a good civil rights bill in the Constitution as it stands. The freedom of the press, of speech, and protection to life, liberty, and property are secured thereby, and yet for more than half a century none of those rights have been enjoyed by a large portion of the southern people; they were only granted to a privileged class. The black man was not allowed to learn to read the Constitution that pointed him to liberty, or the Bible that pointed him to God; the white man who had spoken or written against slavery was hanged upon the nearest tree or banished from the realm. And so it will be again if suffrage is not impartial. Southern courts now defy and disobey the civil rights bill. Everything there is organized against the black man, from the judge upon the bench to the constable with his process; every officer, State, legislative, judicial, county, town, and municipal, who is called upon in any manner to enforce those laws and carry out those sacred guarantees of the Constitution are the enemies of the loyal men and freedmen; and opposed to the execution of those laws and guarantees. The black man is helpless to punish or remove from office those unfaithful officers; he has no vote, no place in the jury-box, no means of organization for the defense of his rights; but with the ballot in his hands all will be well; these officials will do him justice, and there will be in every State, county, town, and precinct in the South a power in the hands of our friends to protect themselves and to preserve the Republic.

We cannot afford longer to feed these people upon husks. We denied them their rights until those rights were reasserted in the smoke of battle and in the blood of a million men. Let us be wise at last. We put the bullet into their hands when traitors struck at the nation's life, why not give them the ballot to preserve that nation from treason in another guise.

Their skins are black you say; ay, but their hearts are true and their blood is loyal. They were good enough to fight, why not good enough to vote. I cannot upon this subject but quote my own words upon a former occasion:

"And the four million black men who were the slaves and under the control of the rebels, who were away from the Union lines and its protection, who only knew God because they saw Him in the stars and heard Him in the winds—for the Bible to them was a forbidden book—they who had only known the flag from the stripes it gave them and the Union from the chains it bound them with; they who from the first sent their morning and evening prayers to Heaven that the nation might live, who furnished our soldiers flying from captivity and death with guide and shelter, food and fire, while the master let slip blood-hounds on the fugitive's track; who of the four millions betrayed a loyal man? Not one but exposed the traitor master. This faithfulness on the part of those poor, simple, ignorant men is to my mind one of the grandest phases that the war has displayed.

How strange the contrast between the slave in his chains and the master who had been pampered by the Government. The former kissed and upheld the rod that had smitten him, the latter smote the hand that had fed him. And yet we are asked at this time to consign these loyal men, both white and black, to the mercy, as I have said, of these rebels and enemies.

"I am free to say, Mr. Chairman, that if such is to be the policy of this Government it is recreant to its high duty; it is unworthy of all the blood shed and treasure expended in its cause; it deserves to perish in its ingratitude and be blotted from the face of the earth."

But we are told, "give them a qualified suffrage," "give it to those who can read and write or who own property and pay taxes."

As to the first proposition I must say that I deem it wholly impracticable. We cannot with any justice or fairness apply an intelligence qualification to the black unless we do so to the white voters, and in so doing we would disfranchise many thousands who are now voters. We cannot take the back track and disfranchise loyal white men in the South and elsewhere who have exercised that privilege for years, and some of whom, white and black, have confronted treason upon many a bloody field and have worn the livery of the Republic. Would you take the ballot from them? Besides we need them all to vote down traitors. Are they not good enough for that?

We did not ask the black men at Port Hudson and at Petersburg whether they could read when we trusted them with the country's honor and its flag; shall we insist upon it now when the ballot is needed for their and our protection in the South? As to a property qualification, that is simply absurd and a blot where it exists upon the civilization of the age. Benjamin Franklin's illustration in such a case, that it is the jackass that votes and not the man, has never been controverted. Discriminations in political privileges against some classes and in favor of others in a free country are odious and productive of popular discontent. The only test of suffrage in this country is manhood; give it to all men; to the poor and the lowly; lift them up to the dignity of the sovereign. Some say that the ex-slave will vote as the ex-master directs; and this slander has been repeated in high official quarters.

The negro knew on which side to fight and to pray during the rebellion; he will know well on which side to vote; he has got his liberty after a century of oppression and bondage, he will guard that liberty well when he handles the ballot.

These same objectors said that the negro would not fight, that he would be guilty of all kinds of excesses in his newly-found liberty, that he would not work. Like the sixty day oracle of the State Department they are shown to be false prophets.

The negro fought well, he obeyed the law, he went to work like a good citizen; he is learning to read and write all over the South with an earnestness and a rapidity that is astonishing; trust him with the ballot he will use it better than a white traitor.

But, says another, you would allow former rebels to vote. Certainly I would allow the masses who were led into the rebellion, conscripted or forced into it, to resume the right of suffrage; I would have no conflict with them. Clothe them with power and thus assure them that a just Government, while it punished the leaders of the rebellion for example's sake and to prevent their doing further mischief, is humane and generous to the misguided masses. They got only poor fare and hard knocks from the confederacy. Disqualify all these leaders, false teachers, and guides both from office and suffrage; give the black man the ballot; trust the people; let the masses reconstruct the new State government. The people have interests and sympathies in common; they will readily assimilate and act together.

Trusted by the Government and protected by it, those who have been disloyal will come to love it. In most of the States the men hitherto loyal will be in the majority, and in all the States powerful enough to defend themselves. Politicians and ambitious men will become the servants of their will; new men will spring up from the people faithful to our Government, who will assume the place of the leaders of to-day who have betrayed the people almost to their destruction.

Again, we cannot permanently disfranchise large bodies of men in this country with safety to the nation. Deprived of political power every subterfuge will be resorted to to regain it, and the masses will grow more restless and discontented until they sweep over all barriers, as they have in Maryland, and render the presence of the military continuously necessary to preserve the peace of the State. I hope Tennessee and Missouri will be wise in time by availing themselves of the black vote at once. With the Government in the hands of a majority of all the people of each State, all will be protected and the true theory of a free Government carried out, and the State is republican indeed. Is not this a "consummation devoutly to be wished?"

That nation is wise whose policy tends to the elevation of the masses of its people, to dignify and honor labor, to give to all loyal citizens a share in the Government they uphold. In so doing each man feels a direct responsibility in himself; he shares in the pride, glory, and prosperity of his country; he feels great inducements to qualify himself for the duties of the citizen; he feels encouraged to educate his children that they may be better fitted still for those duties. When the land is assailed by foes from without or convulsions within he springs to arms as one whose personal rights and highest privileges are in danger. Each true man that is clothed with political rights is a pillar to the State; each mind that is elevated in the scale of intelligence binds stronger the bonds of the Republic and makes liberty more secure.

The instincts of the people, ignorant and lowly though they be, are right. They seek out justice and abhor tyrants; they are naturally inclined to be loyal and true. Trust them and the nation will live, ignore them and the nation will perish.

Why not meet the issue now? Why not, men of this Congress, come up to the high demands of the times and complete the work? We cannot put this negro question out of sight; like the ghost of the murdered Banquo, it will arise at every feast and "shake its gory locks" at us; it will not down at our bidding. All acknowledge that suffrage to the black man must come in time; why not insist upon it now, when we are building anew the national temple and have the power to accomplish it? As a matter simply of expediency, is it not better than to let the agitation go on for another generation, to be ended, perhaps, in another rebellion, in more blood?

Adopt the plan I propose and all the States will be represented in the next Congress, the murder, persecution, and banishment of Union men will cease. The Constitution, the civil rights bill, and all other provisions of law for the protection of the people of the South will be a living fact realized in every portion of the South, for everywhere the loyal man will be clothed with the power of enforcing those rights. The South will turn its attention to reviving its exhausted fields and repairing its desolate places. The country, relieved of the problem of reconstruction, will turn its attention to many neglected questions of national importance, to reviving its trade and industry, correcting the errors of its financial system, and paying its debts. Pursue the other policy further, let things drift, and finally let those rebel organizations into Congress without giving our friends in the South the protection of the ballot, and I can see many dark hours in store for the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, we may be told that Congress has agreed to admit the representatives from those States when they adopt the constitutional amendments now before them. Congress has agreed to no such thing, but I most earnestly desire the adoption of those amendments, and we should insist upon it to the last. But you will observe that these rebel State organizations do not propose to adopt the amendments. Some of them have already rejected them, and the tone of the Governors and presses of the other States leave no doubt but the whole ten will reject them. This is in pursuance of the policy announced by Alexander H. Stephens, that the South would submit to no further conditions and forms—an additional reason why new State governments should be organized in which the friends of the Government and the amendments should take part so that the amendments will finally receive the approval of the requisite number of States, and become part of the Constitution.

Let them rail on about their rights, these "last ditch" gentlemen, and proclaim what they will or will not do. They have tried the wager of battle, been vanquished in the field, and now they must submit to the will of the conqueror, and whether they will adopt the amendment or not will not retard the great work before us. Other men will answer the demands of the nation; other State organizations will sanction the amendments; and if these malcontents hatch up a new rebellion, the problem of reconstruction will be solved as to them finally and forever, for not one of them will be left unburied or unhung.

But we are told that if we reject these State organizations the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery will fall to the ground. Well, if the Supreme Court, as it is very likely to do, should decide that those rebel machines were not States that claimed to adopt this amendment, and that the concurrence of three fourths of the thirty-six States is necessary to pass the amendment, then we should have it solemnly decided and settled that the great amendment was not adopted. Let us avoid any such contingency; let us make this amendment a part of the Constitution beyond doubt by creating valid State organizations that will legally adopt it. The emancipation proclamation of Mr. Lincoln struck the shackles from the bondmen in all the seceding States. The amendment has been adopted by all the free States, and can be adopted by the requisite number as soon as the southern States are properly reorganized.

The leaders of the rebellion should never again return to power in this country. Our fathers disfranchised Tories, and so should we disfranchise all those bold bad men who fired the southern heart,

"Who cheered the band and waved the sword,
As leaders in a rebel horde."

They should never again be clothed with trust in this Government. The prowling guerrilla, the wretch that starved prisoners to death, should likewise be deprived; and the editors and publishers of those vile secession sheets that fanned the flame of the rebellion, that studiously misrepresented the Union and its friends, deceived and beguiled the southern masses into rebellion, and then prolonged it for years by the same means, and are still seeking to widen the breach and keep alive the spirit of insubordination in the hearts of their victims; none of these restless, dangerous men should ever again cast a vote or hold an office under this Government.

A few of the more prominent of these leaders should be tried for treason, and if convicted hung for treason. Let the remainder of them live and have an abiding place even under the flag they dishonored and sought to tear down; but let them go, disfranchised, shorn of all political power, with the mark of the traitor upon them, until they shall perish from the earth, and let their names and memory go down to all coming time as infamous, and as a warning; thus "treason will be made odious."

I am opposed to general amnesty. For all time to come ambitious and unscrupulous men should be admonished by the fate of the moving spirits of the great rebellion that such acts are attended with danger; that life and property may be lost in such an attempt; that treason is not a pastime or an adventure, to be undertaken without risk to lift those engaged in it to power and honor if successful and to be attended with no evil consequences if unsuccessful, but that the nation while magnanimous is just, and justice will punish with severity a sufficient number to be a lesson to all others in like case offending. The fact that we have neglected that duty so long makes no difference. The traitor cannot complain of the delay in his own favor. Every consideration of duty, justice, honor, and public safety demands this. The warnings of the past, the terrible realities of the present, and the hopes of the future all require it. I have hope for the nation, for I believe it will be just. My dream is of a model Republic, extending equal protection and rights to all men from ocean to ocean, from the great lakes to the Gulf, that a mighty people shall rise up strong in freedom, in knowledge, and in power.

The South shall cease to be a section and become a part of the nation; her sons and daughters shall build altars to freedom in her waste places; the wilderness shall vanish, the church and school-house will appear, and light and knowledge will illumine her dark corners; freedom of speech, of opinion, and of the press will be as much secured in South Carolina as in Maine; all men shall be citizens, and high and clear in the fundamental law will that charter of citizenship be found guiding the nation like a pillar of flame; the whole land will revive under the magic touch of free labor, and we shall arise from the ashes of the rebellion to a purer life and a higher destiny, illustrating the grand truth of man's capacity for self-government; then Columbia will march on through the ages that are to come, her navies triumphant on every sea, her commerce encircling the earth, her arms the terror of tyrants and the hope of slaves, her influence ascendant in every capital; the oppressed of all nations will come to our shores, and free Governments everywhere be founded from the inspiration of our example; firm upon the rock of justice and equality the temple reared by our fathers and purified by the blood of our brothers shall stand in the midst of the wondering nations the most potent, free, and glorious of all. Shall this be so? It is ours to say.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the President's annual message, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 373) entitled "An act releasing to Francis S. Lyon the interest of the United States in certain lands;" whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 14, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of J. H. Merrill, a captain in what was known as the naval brigade, praying for compensation for his services; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of James Jones, praying for compensation for services rendered as assistant assessor of internal revenue for the sixth division of the first district of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of H. Claremont Moses, praying for compensation for services rendered as assistant assessor of internal revenue for the first district of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I present the petition of Charles Appleton, an inmate of the Soldiers' Home, with a pension of three dollars a month. He is compelled to remain in that position, kept from his family and from his friends and from all social intercourse. This would seem to be rather a penalty than a reward for having served his country. Rather than make institutions wherein our soldiers will be kept away from social intercourse, I think we should give them pensions of a sufficient amount to enable them to remain at home in social communion with their family and friends, and in that way pass their lives happier and better. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I have been requested to present the memorial of the clerks and civil employes of the respective Executive Departments in Washington, indorsed and approved by the heads of the Departments and by the chiefs of the bureaus, praying for an increase of their compensation. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

COMPENSATION OF TENNESSEE SENATORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received from the Secretary of the Senate a communication addressed to him personally, asking direction in regard to the payment of the salaries of the Senators recently admitted from the State of Tennessee. As the case is one in some respects of first impression, the Chair deems it proper to lay the communication before the Senate in order to have the benefit of the judgment of the Senate on the case stated in the communication. With the permission of the Senate the communication will be read.

The communication was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.
WASHINGTON, December 13, 1866.

SIR: My attention has been called to the question of the payment of the Senators admitted from the State of Tennessee at the last session of Congress. As the decision of the question properly pertains to you as the Presiding Officer of the Senate, I desire to be informed whether the payment of compensation to them is to be made from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress or from the date of their admission as Senators.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN W. FORNEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

Hon. L. F. S. FOSTER, President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What order will the Senate pass in reply to the suggestion made in the letter just read?

Mr. WILSON. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, have directed me to report it back with two amendments. This is a bill containing a very few items which it is necessary should be passed immediately. It is a very short bill and can readily be understood from the reading; but if any gentleman wants information I can give it.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was to strike out the following item:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following item:

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to pay the three watchmen appointed under resolution of July 25, 1866, at $900 each, $2,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bills, which yesterday received the signature of the Speaker of the House:

A bill (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin; and

A bill (S. No. 373) releasing to Francis S. Lyon the interest of the United States in certain lands.

CLARA MOORE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition and accompanying papers of Clara Moore, widow of Ely Moore, deceased, praying for payment to her of the claim of her husband for an amount paid for additional clerks and office accommodations for those clerks in the register's office at Leecompton, Douglas county, Kansas, have instructed me to report back the papers and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the case. There was an adverse report in the case at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on discharging the committee from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the committee will not be discharged. I have further papers in the case that I desire to present to the committee, and I would be gratified if the committee would withhold that report and allow the additional papers to be presented. It is early in the session, and I did not suppose the report would be made so soon or I should have had the papers in before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to recommit the report?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; I make that motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose the additional papers to which the Senator from Kansas refers are now in the hands of the clerk and have been examined by the committee. Since the adverse report was made at the last term certain affidavits have been submitted to the committee, but in the judgment of the committee they do not change the state of the case so as to entitle the petitioner to the relief for which she prays. I will say to the Senator from Kansas, that the difficulty in this case is not so much in the particular facts presented by the petitioner as in a decision establishing a dangerous precedent. The committee are not inclined to make a decision in this case which will be a precedent for similar decisions in other cases. The fact is that nearly all the land officers of the United States stand in the position in which the husband of this petitioner stood; and if an allowance be made to her in this case there will be no reason why all the land officers that have been employed by the Government for the last ten, twelve, or twenty years should not be allowed extra compensation. It is chiefly upon that ground that the committee have instructed me to make this adverse report, and I do not think that any additional papers can be submitted by the Senator which will change the decision of the committee in this case. It has been twice thoroughly examined by the committee and considered, and I think it is time that the case was ended.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no doubt the committee desire to do exact and equal justice, whatever the precedent may be. The papers in this case show what cannot be shown in other cases, that there was in the first place a permission, and in the second place an agreement, that clerk hire should be had; and those are the papers upon which I rely, and which I desire to place before the committee. I do not wish to argue the case on the mere question of recommitting it to the committee; but when the committee shall have all the papers before them, and examined the case fully, I have no doubt they will report in favor of allowing something—perhaps the whole claim.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon if the attention of the committee was called to the law which authorizes the adjustment of the accounts of the registers and receivers for the expenses they incur, by the Commissioner of the Land Office, with a view to their reference to Congress for compensation? There was a law of that kind passed somewhere about the year 1856, I think, and under that law the registers and receivers thought they were authorized to employ clerks and to meet the expenses of their offices out of the public Treasury, but the Commissioner of the General Land Office was not authorized to adjust the accounts finally and give them a credit for the expenditures, but it was contemplated that the claims should come before Congress. The act of Congress contemplated it; and I wish to ask the Senator, whether the committee has considered that law in connection with this particular claim? It seems to me that it has something to do with it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say, Mr. President, that the attention of the committee was called to that law, or to the supposed law, and the conclusion of the committee was that there has been no law authorizing registers and receivers to appoint clerks; and as the appointment of those clerks was made without any authority of law, of course it is discretionary with Congress whether extra compensation should or should not be allowed. The uniform practice has been in all other cases, with perhaps one or two exceptions, to deny to registers and receivers extra compensation for clerk hire, and there is no reason that I can see why this case should be excepted from the general rule that has been applied to all the other land offices in the country.

Now, there is a grave question as to the merits of this application. I did not think it necessary to discuss that. But independent of the justice of this claim, it is the judgment of the committee that if an allowance be made to the petitioner in the case it will open the door to hundreds, perhaps thousands, of claims of a similar nature by all the land officers of the United States, for they have all, as I understand, or nearly all, employed clerks and incurred extra expense. The opinion of the General Land Office has been that the law provided sufficient pay to them for their services; and in this particular case the evidence shows that this man for four years' service received over eighteen thousand dollars from the Treasury, and out of that he paid a portion for clerk hire and incidental expenses; and it is the opinion of the committee that he was very well compensated for his labor. There is an elaborate report from the Commissioner of the Land Office showing that he might have discharged this labor without the employment of extra force. If he saw proper, rather than perform the duties himself, to employ clerks to perform them, it was the opinion of the Department that he ought to pay those clerks. He could not be idle and employ clerks to do the business, and then ask extra compensation for the payment of those clerks. These additional affidavits that have been filed were to the effect, that while he was register of the Land Office he was engaged for a portion of the time in adjudicating conflicting claims and questions before the Land Office, as though that gave him a right to extra compensation. If he did that he only did what all registers and receivers have done and are constantly doing in the country, and there is no reason that I can see why this case should be made an exception to the general rule. If it is desired, however, I shall not insist upon my objection to its recommitment; but it seems to me that if a case has been twice examined the parties concerned ought to be satisfied.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think this claim should be recommitted. If the committee has given the construction to the act that was intended by Congress for the relief of the registers and receivers which is intimated by the Senator from Oregon, I do not agree in that construction, unless I fail to recollect the law altogether. The law did authorize the Department to adjust the accounts of registers and receivers upon the discretion of the Commissioner, and to report that adjustment to Congress for allowance. I do not see how the account could be adjusted unless the clerks were employed in advance. I do not see what the Commissioner could possibly have to adjust, upon the construction which the Senator from Oregon says the committee has given to that law. I think it would be well enough for the committee to give their attention once more to that law. I was not, when I was Commissioner of the Land Office, of the opinion that that law had the construction now named. I thought that the register was expected to employ the clerks, and that on the faith of that law Congress would make them an allowance where the case was proper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask him if he is not aware that a decision has been made by the Supreme Court of the United States upon this question as to allowing registers and receivers extra compensation? I am advised that a decision was made by the United States district court of the State of Iowa in conformity somewhat with the views expressed by the Senator from Indiana. That case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judgment was reversed, and, as I understand the decision—I have not examined it particularly with reference to this case—it was in effect that registers and receivers were not allowed extra compensation for their services or the care of money in their hands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will explain to the Senator from Oregon the case which was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States. It was not in relation to the compensation of registers and receivers for any expense of clerk hire or office expenses whatever. When I was Commissioner the office held that the registers and receivers were limited in their compensation to $3,000, but they claimed that they were entitled to all the fees for locating land warrants, and that they were not required to account to the Government at all for those fees. I am free to say it was a very doubtful question, in my judgment; the laws were very conflicting and confused upon the question. The district court of the United States for Iowa, upon a suit brought to recover those fees for locating land warrants, held that the registers and receivers were not bound to account for them, but that they were their individual fees and did not go into the maximum of $3,000. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed that decision. It had nothing whatever to do with the compensation for clerk hire; and if the Commissioner of the Land Office has recently informed the committee that there was no occasion to employ clerks at the LeCompton land office, at the time Colonel Moore was there, I think he has given that information without sufficient information on his own part. Kansas was then being filled up very rapidly, and mainly by preemption settlers. Each case had to undergo an adjudication, and there were very many litigated cases in Kansas, and the litigated cases required nearly all the time of the register and receiver in their examination. Many of those cases occupied a week of careful investigation, these men holding a court. Much of their time was thus occupied; and the clerks were necessary to carry on the ordinary business of the office for the convenience of the settlers. There is no question about it that they were compelled, if the business of the Government was to be carried on at all, to employ clerks. I did not, when I was in the Land Office, think that they were sufficiently compensated, nor do I yet. I do not think this extends to all the land officers in the United States holding offices at that time. It would apply to some portions of Iowa, to some portions of Kansas, and some portions of Minnesota, where the settlements were being made very rapidly under the preemption laws. Where they have paid out much of the money that they received for their own compensation for clerk hire, it seems to me some compensation ought to be given, and therefore I shall support the proposition to recommit this case.

Mr. POMEROY. When the case shall be reported from the committee for action I shall desire to make a very full statement in regard to this land office. I am perfectly familiar with the whole matter. It was in the county of Douglas where I lived at that time, and where nearly every claim was contested. It was an office of constant litigation. Our men camped out before the office for months waiting for their turns. It is one of those cases that recommends itself more strongly for extra compensation than any case I ever knew, and I do not know in fact of another one in the State. The Senator from Oregon says this will be a precedent for other cases. It is the only one that has ever come to my knowledge from our section of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first motion in order being that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, the Chair will put that motion in the first instance.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is that the report be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND OFFICE REPORT FOR EUROPE.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public

Lands, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate directing them to inquire and report upon the expediency of printing the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the different languages spoken on the continent of Europe, for distribution at the Paris Exposition, have had the same under consideration, and believing that the publication of that report and accompanying papers in the leading languages of Europe, and the distribution of the same at the Paris Exposition, will promote immigration and the development of the public lands of the United States, respectfully recommend that they be printed in the following languages: five thousand copies in German, five thousand in French, five thousand in the Swedish, and five thousand for the use of the Senate of the United States; but the committee not being informed in regard to the expense of this printing desire me to move that the resolution and report be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONNESS. There was also, if I remember aright, a resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] concerning the printing of some extra copies of the maps accompanying that report, and I should like to know whether they are included in this motion.

Mr. POMEROY. I have simply said "the report and accompanying papers." Those are the reports of the surveyors general and the maps accompanying the report, which the committee recommend to have printed as well as the report proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring this subject to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF SENATOR FOOT'S WIDOW.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mrs. Mary Foot, widow of Hon. Solomon Foot, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Vermont, the amount due the deceased at the time of his death, for compensation according to the act of the last session increasing the compensation of members of Congress.

PAYMENT OF SENATOR COLLAMER'S WIDOW.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mrs. Mary N. Collamer, widow of Hon. Jacob Collamer, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Vermont, the amount of compensation due the deceased at the time of his death according to the act of the last session increasing the compensation of members of Congress.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 472) to authorize the establishment of a library in the City of Washington for the use of Government employes and other persons; which was read twice by its title, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 473) making agricultural and mechanical college scrip receivable in payment for preemption claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DARIEN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 149) to extend aid and facilities to citizens of the United States engaged in the survey of a route for a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien; which was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to issue orders to the senior officers of the Navy at Panama and at Aspinwall to aid parties from the United States who are undertaking a survey of the Isthmus of Darien for the purpose of discovering a favorable line for a ship-canal to connect the two oceans so far as the same can be done without prejudice to the interests of the naval service at those stations, or at additional expense to the Government.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In this connection I desire simply to state that informally I presented the matter to the consideration of the Committee on Commerce, who as informally gave it their approval, so far as the manner of arriving at the desired result is concerned. I have also consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who in the same manner approved of the proposition. The case is simply this: some ten or more gentlemen of high standing and of wealth and of enterprise have associated themselves together and have contributed a fund for the employment of a party of surveyors for the purpose of investigation. They have some slight idea, from the knowledge of the past and from the investigations of the present, and from information from parties with whom they have connection, that there may be found a line of connection between the two oceans where many hundred years ago the Indians sailed from the Atlantic to the Pacific and vice versa. The object of this resolution is to request the Secretary of the Navy, when it can be done at no expense to the Government, and so as not to be incompatible with the naval service, to aid these parties in the prosecution of that enterprise.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it will be remembered that about the end of the last session of Congress there were some resolutions passed upon this subject, and an appropriation of money obtained, to enable the War Department to conduct a survey wherever it should be found practicable upon the report to be made from the chief of the Naval Observatory on that subject; and further explorations were directed with a view of ascertaining the best route for a ship-canal between the two oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific. This appears to be a movement entirely separate and apart from that, and instituted or to be instituted by private parties or capitalists on their own account. For one, I am in favor of any and every means of developing further knowledge and throwing further light upon the great subject involved; but I would suggest to my friend who has introduced this resolution that it should be more specific in its character, and that in place of directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish ships at the instance of persons who might apply, a particular organization of citizens should be designated and their responsibility shown before action should be taken; or, in other words, that the resolution should have that shape. I would say also to my friend that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads had charge of the subject last year and have considered it, though I have no choice, for one, as to which committee of this body it should go to. I think it will be found that perhaps another shape for the resolution will be necessary. I am very glad that the honorable Senator has undertaken to aid in the preliminary steps of the grand enterprise of constructing a great ship-canal between the two oceans.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President this is preliminary; the formation of the company is in the future. It may be remembered that the Government of the United States have for many years had the matter of a ship-canal under their serious consideration. We have from time to time had reports in relation to that object. We have sent expeditions there, obtaining the consent of the authorities of the Isthmus, and have at great expense and at great loss of life been unable up to the present time to succeed. It would not be a marvel, nor would it be surprising, if that which the Government has failed to accomplish should be accomplished by private enterprise. It would not be astonishing if in this case as in many others a great enterprise should be successfully carried into effect after Government had made every effort for its accomplishment and had failed. I can see no possible objection to affording whatever facilities the naval officers at these points may furnish to the party of gentlemen who are undertaking this enterprise. I can guaranty, as a Senator, the respectability and the reliability of these gentlemen, and I know that what they may ask for will not be any expense to the Government or in any form contrary to the interests of the naval service upon this continent.

I trust the Senate will pass the resolution. There is nothing more in it than is presented on its face; and I should support a similar resolution of the honorable Senator from California, if he or a company of his friends should have an idea that there might be a line in the secret recesses of that region not thought of, not known, and not believed by ninety-nine hundredths of mankind.

Mr. GRIMES. When the Senator from Rhode Island was kind enough to show me this resolution yesterday, no objection occurred to my mind at that time and none has since occurred to its passage; but I suggest to him that it would be well enough for him to modify it so that this direction of the Secretary of the Navy may be sent to any officer rather than to the officers who may happen for the moment to be in command at Aspinwall and Panama. They may be subordinate officers; and were the Secretary of the Navy disposed to shrink from the responsibility which the resolution naturally confers upon him, which I have no reason to suppose would be the case—in fact I am satisfied it would not be the case—there would be abundant opportunity for him to do so according to the phraseology of the resolution. I would suggest to the Senator that he modify it so as to authorize the Secretary to direct either the admiral in command of the South Pacific squadron or the admiral in command of the South Atlantic squadron to attend to this matter, or to detail any naval officer that he may see fit, and not to specify that this service must be rendered by the naval officer who may happen for the time to be in command at Aspinwall or Panama. Now, I think, we have no naval officer at Aspinwall. We had a receiving-ship there during the war, but have not now.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is intended by the Department, as I am told, to have a vessel always at one or the other of these points.

Mr. GRIMES. One of them.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I shall be very glad to modify the resolution as proposed by the Senator from Iowa, to meet the desired end, so that the order may be addressed to any officer instead of the officer in command at those points.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 598.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution before the Senate is not yet disposed of.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will prepare an amendment to the resolution to meet the views of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, while the joint resolution is being modified, the Chair will lay before the body a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives.

ADJOURNMENT FOR CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

The Secretary read the following resolution received yesterday from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Thursday the 20th instant, they adjourn to meet on Thursday the 3d day of January next.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will lead to debate. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to its present consideration?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution must lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia; and also that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of the Territory of Nebraska into the Union as a State.

Mr. POLAND. Early last week I gave notice to the Senate that on Monday of this week I would move to proceed to the consideration of the House bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. I was not aware at the time of giving that notice that a similar notice had been given by the honorable Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, [Mr. MORRELL,] that he would ask at that time to have the bill taken up which has been under consideration for the last three or four days. I did not desire to antagonize this bill against that one, and I therefore waived the notice I had given and allowed that bill to be taken up without any controversy in relation to the order of business. The motion is now to proceed to the consideration of a House bill, which was passed at a later period in the last session than the bill that I have in charge, the bankrupt bill. It seems to me that if there is any bill which is deserving of consideration, deserving of precedence, one in which a very large number of persons are interested, and very deeply interested too, it is this bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. Certainly no bill is now before the Senate, there will be none before the Senate—I mean none having no political significance—in which so large a number of persons are interested and feel a deep interest. I hope that the motion of the Senator from Ohio to take up the bill he refers to will not prevail, but that the Senate will allow me to have the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy taken up and considered. It is an earlier bill and a more important bill, as I believe, than the one which the gentleman has in charge.

Mr. WADE. I think that this bill for the admission of a State into the Union, which has been delayed so long, is as pressing and as worthy of immediate consideration as any other business which could be presented. I do not think it is quite just to those gentlemen who have been elected to this body as Senators, and who have waited for a long time in a state of uncertainty, for us to delay the decision of the question whether they shall come into this body or not. If they are entitled to their seats here, as I have no doubt they are, it is their right, and what is more, it is the right of their State, that they should be upon this floor and participate in the disposition of the very question that the Senator from Vermont wishes to antagonize with this and all other important questions. I cannot conceive that there is any question more pressing and important than for us to ascertain who are entitled to seats upon this floor and to participate with us in the legislation of the body. If the people of Nebraska have entitled themselves to admission, it is their right to be represented here; and it is discourteous to the gentlemen whom they have sent not to consider their case. They have been exceedingly patient; they have been kept long waiting; they are anxious to have the question decided; and I hope the Senate will take it up now and decide it. In regard to the bill of the Senator from Vermont, I will only say that my mind is not quite made up as to how I shall vote upon it; but that does not affect the question now before us. I think the bill I have in charge is one which is entitled to precedence.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I am against the bill which has been moved to-day by my excellent friend, the Senator from Ohio, and I am in favor of the bill which has been moved by the Senator from Vermont. In saying that I am against the bill for the admission of Nebraska, I do not now intend to argue that question. There will, perhaps, be a time for that. I merely state now why I think we should not so swiftly proceed to its consideration.

You do not forget, sir, the great act of yesterday. By the vote of this Chamber you have recorded yourselves in favor of human rights, and in favor of the establishment of human rights to the extent of your ability under the Constitution. And now, sir, a proposition is before you to set aside human rights in the very respect in which you honored them yesterday. You have before you a constitution containing the word "white." You have before you a constitution creating a white man's government, that government which Senators over the way yesterday declared themselves in favor of. Sir, I am against any such government, and I am against the Senate proceeding with its consideration, especially now when it has recorded itself in favor of enfranchisement in the District of Columbia.

I, sir, entreat you not to-day to undo the good work of yesterday. Perhaps you do not forget the story of antiquity of the personage who unwove at night the web which she had woven during the day, so that her work never proceeded to any end. The Senate of the United States, I hope, will not imitate that ancient example. Do not to-day unweave the web of yesterday, that beautiful web woven for freedom and human rights.

Against this measure there is another measure beneficent in its character, which involves no sacrifice of human rights, which the Senate may properly consider on this day after it has recorded itself so bravely yesterday in favor of human rights; that is, the proposition for a new bankrupt bill. It is a measure of beneficence which is to carry tranquillity and repose into the business of the country. It is a measure that has been long postponed. You do not forget that during two sessions it was in charge of the Senator from Connecticut who is now in the chair, [Mr. FOSTER,] and that we failed to reach a vote upon it. During the last session it was in the charge of my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] and we failed to reach a vote. The other House has voted upon it. It only remains that the Senate should vote upon it in order to consummate that great work.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not enter upon that measure which has in it nothing that is good, nothing but a disastrous example to this Republic at this time, but will proceed with the consideration of a measure which has in it so much of real advantage.

Mr. WADE. I was in hopes that the merits of the bill would not be discussed upon a mere motion to take it up for consideration. I do not believe that course of proceeding is strictly in order, because if that were allowed we might spend a whole day on a motion to take up a bill. But when the Senator from Massachusetts undertakes in advance, and out of order, as I think, to prejudice a measure of which I am the advocate, I must be allowed a moment to answer him.

He says there is no merit in the bill, and therefore it should not be taken up, undertaking himself to prejudge it and to judge for the whole Senate. In his judgment it is a bill of no merit. Sir, if he were the sole judge here, I should give it up at once, I should come down very quickly; but he is not the judge to decide ultimately for this body; and this way of dealing with the subject is not altogether satisfactory to me.

As the Senator has made allusions to antiquity, he will permit me to remind him that there was an ancient saying, that some men would strain at a gnat and swallow a camel, and I do not see but that the remark is applicable to him on the present occasion. Why, sir, on the very objection which the Senator makes, he is himself committed upon the merits of this bill to vote for it. No Jesuit can draw the line of distinction between his votes on former measures and the vote I ask him to give for this measure. How was it when the constitutional amendment was up last session? That Senator voted for it. Did that compel a State before coming into the Union to allow franchise to all citizens indiscriminately? No, sir, not at all. The only penalty it prescribed for a State which made discriminations was that the class whom it excluded from the franchise should not be counted in the basis of representation. So it will be with Nebraska if we pass this bill. The only difference between the cases is that the Senator gave his vote in favor of a rebel State that now has her representation on this floor, equally divided between rebellion and loyalty. He voted that she might come in. I allude to Tennessee.

Mr. SUMNER. Did I vote for that?

Mr. WADE. I believe you did.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no.

Mr. WADE. But the principle on which you did vote would have brought it in nevertheless. It is exactly the same question with this difference, this is a Territory which has always been loyal, always patriotic, which sent into the field to fight the battles against rebellion more troops in proportion to her inhabitants than perhaps any other State or Territory in the Union. Small though she was, she was extremely patriotic, and exerted herself to the utmost to perform all her duties to the General Government. And yet, sir, (turning to Mr. SUMNER,) you now raise an objection against her though you voted for a rebel State. That is all there is in the case. I hope no such consideration will induce us for one moment to postpone the consideration of this bill. Let us put it upon its merits, and let us do justice to the Representatives and Senators from these new States that are waiting here and are compelled to wait here in the performance of their duty to their constituencies. Let us decide their case, and if it is the judgment of this body that they are not entitled to seats here, let their constituents know it that they may take other steps. My judgment is that no Territory ever knocked at your doors for admission as a State with greater reason to be successful than does this Territory of Nebraska, and I think I can show it when the question comes up properly. There are gentlemen upon this floor and elsewhere contending that the little State of Florida, with not so many inhabitants as Nebraska, a State scarred all over with rebellion, must be admitted here and cannot wait a moment; but when this loyal Territory of Nebraska with more inhabitants asks for admission, the Senator from Massachusetts stands like a lion in the pathway to keep her out, when really he wants her aid to carry great measures in the direction that he and I advocate. I hope the question will not be postponed.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President, I do not propose to go at all into the respective merits of these bills on the question of which shall first be taken up. I am very decidedly in favor of a bankrupt law; I believe that it is a most wise and beneficial measure, and I believe that this bill which has passed the House of Representatives is a very excellent, well-drawn bill; but I apprehend there may be other gentlemen in the Senate who may differ from me in that regard. As to the measure that is proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Ohio, I am not prepared to say whether I am in favor of it or not. I have not given it sufficient consideration. I do not put the question of precedence between these two bills at all on the question of their respective merits; and I apprehend that if we are to determine that beforehand, in advance, if that is to be a preliminary question always, we never shall know what to take up. The bankrupt bill was passed at an earlier period in the House than the bill of which the Senator from Ohio has the charge; it came into the Senate earlier. I gave notice, as I said, last week that I would call it up on Monday of this week; but having learned that the honorable Senator from Maine had given a similar notice in favor of a bill which was earlier than mine, that had passed the House earlier and came to the Senate earlier than the bankrupt bill, I yielded out of courtesy to him. I waived the notice I had given to call up this bill as I did not desire to antagonize with him; but it seems I yielded altogether more to courtesy than I was entitled to do. How far, having given a notice of this sort, entitles a Senator to be allowed to proceed according to the notice he has given, especially after he has once yielded to a prior notice, is more than my experience here enables me to say. Certainly if I am not allowed to proceed with this bill at the present time, I am not allowed that courtesy which I extended. It seems to me that the bill I have in charge is entitled to be first taken up.

Mr. WADE. I barely wish to say, in reply to the Senator from Vermont, that I have not antagonized anything to his measure. He says that he has given way. I believe he does not mean that he has given way to any measure that I had in charge.

Mr. POLAND. No, but to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WADE. I gave way also to him, because I was exceedingly anxious that the matter of which he had charge should come up and be disposed of. Fair notice has been given of my intention to present this measure. The question is fairly before the Senate: which of the two bills indicated ought to be acted on? I do not wish to take any further time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think what the Senator from Ohio demands now of the Senate is unusual, perhaps without a precedent, if not irregular. He says that there is a special demand of the State of Colorado for admission—

Mr. WADE. It is not the Colorado bill that I propose to take up, but the Nebraska bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought it was the Colorado bill. At any rate the Senator says that Territory has a right to admission as a State. During the last session a bill was passed for the admission of Colorado, and it received a veto. When it was insisted by myself that it was due to the veto and to the subject both that it should be taken up and disposed of by the Senate, the Senator from Ohio then, although the State was here demanding a hearing, demanding admission, was opposed to the consideration of the veto message; and it was by his arguments and his influence in the body that the consideration of the message was postponed at that session. Why, I am not able to say. He now says that a bill introduced for the admission of Nebraska a day or two ago imperatively demands the attention of the Senate; but at the last session he would not allow a bill for a State that he said ought to be admitted to come before the Senate. Why, he knew; I did not know. He did not explain to the Senate; it was enough for him to oppose the consideration of the message.

Mr. WADE. I can very soon relieve the Senator's mind on that subject if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. I had very strong apprehensions that if I allowed that measure to come up it would not pass at that moment. I was not ready for the battle. That was the reason I wished to postpone it; not because I did not desire to have the State in. I supposed the gentlemen were sagacious enough to apprehend what the reason was.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am sure the Senator from Ohio ought to understand that subject very thoroughly, for he first made a speech to prove that Colorado ought not to come in at all, and then he voted that Colorado should not come in, and afterward he became the advocate of her admission, and subsequently, as the champion of that measure, he would not allow it to be considered by this body. I am not undertaking to prove the entire consistency of the course of the Senator; but I am contrasting his course at the last session with regard to the admission of a State, which at the time he said ought to be admitted, with the urgency with which he demands the consideration of this particular bill now. I suppose he thinks it is all ready now for a vote. His proposition in legislation then is, that a bill ought to be considered if it can pass, but ought not to be considered if the mind of the body is against it. I never understood it to be a principle in legislation that it depends on whether a measure can pass whether it ought to be considered. I do not know very much about the particular case of Nebraska; but I think the first bill that ought to be considered here is the one that received the veto at the last session. It is a very unusual course that a new bill should be brought in here and the veto never considered.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I am in favor of both these bills, and I desire to give that one of them precedence which it seems to me ought to have preference in the nature of the case. Although I do not profess to be as well acquainted with the rules of the Senate as the Senator from Indiana, I cannot see why the course now proposed is unusual. When the people of a Territory form a State government, and adopt a constitution in pursuance of an enabling act, and elect Senators, and those Senators present themselves before the Senate of the United States, it seems to me it is not only in order, but it has been the custom and rule of the Senate to proceed immediately to the consideration of that subject. It is first in order. It is naturally in order and entitled to precedence. While I favor the bill of the Senator from Vermont, I hope he will not insist upon its precedence to this bill. Here is a State that has been organized in pursuance of an act of Congress; it is demanding admission; and I would say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it is a State after his own heart. It sends Republican Senators. It is one of our young sisters asking admission into this body. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not press upon the Senate his bill in preference to this. It is due to the State of Nebraska, it is due to the Senators whom she has sent here, that we should say whether they are entitled to seats on this floor or not. Common courtesy dictates that we should consider this question first. Therefore while I expect to support, and shall do so most cheerfully, the bill of the Senator from Vermont, I hope the motion of the Senator from Ohio will prevail.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I suppose that every consideration of propriety would be in favor of the Senate taking up the case of Colorado in preference to a bill relating to another proposed new State. I find by the record that the veto of the Colorado bill was sent to the Senate on the 16th of May last, and was made the special order for the 21st. Its consideration, however, went over during the whole of the remainder of the month of May, during the whole of the month of June, and during so much of the month of July as the Senate remained in session, down to the 28th. That measure remained unacted upon; it still remains among the files of the Senate, a subject undisposed of. Now, sir, I repeat that all considerations of propriety are in favor of taking up that measure and acting upon and determining it before we take up a new case and enter upon a new field of debate. It is true that this case of Nebraska was considered just before the adjournment. It came up suddenly and unexpectedly within two days of the adjournment. We were without full or complete information on the subject. Our papers were defective; our information was limited. Under those circumstances we entered upon the consideration and debate of that question, and the bill passed, but it was not signed. There are, therefore, two undisposed of questions regarding the organization of new States before the Senate, or liable to be brought before it. It appears strange indeed to me, and it will appear strange to others outside of our Chamber who observe our proceedings, that the Senator from Ohio should now move to take up the more recent measure, the later question, in preference to the former one; and particularly when that older measure came back to us vetoed by the President of the United States, thus imposing upon us in a peculiar manner the duty of its consideration.

The Senator from Ohio suggests that the case of Colorado was not acted upon at the last session, because he apprehended that if the judgment of the Senate were then pronounced upon the application it would be against it; at all events that it would fail of obtaining the requisite constitutional vote of two thirds. Mr. President, I think the mode of proceeding which seems to be favored by the Senator from Ohio is one of very doubtful propriety, that a measure should be passed upon at one session of Congress and that at the next session it should be taken up by a single branch of the Government and disposed of. I believe we have a rule that a particular bill which passes the Senate or House at the first session of a Congress may be taken up at the next session, the year after; in the other House, voted upon and passed, so that in point of fact there may be no assent of both Houses at the same time to a measure. The assent of one House is given one year and of the other House and of the President the next year. There is thus no concurrent judgment of all the instrumentalities concerned in the enactment of a law in its passage: assent is given one year by one House and the next year by the other House and by the President. I think that practice, that rule, is open to much question. That, perhaps, ought to be debated hereafter and considered. It may happen in many cases that a bill may become a law, put upon your statute-book, when one branch of the legislative department is opposed to it at the time of its enactment, a thing which ought not to be permitted.

But, sir, how much more objectionable would be such a course of proceeding as that now favored by the Senator from Ohio, a course of proceeding for which he is responsible more than any other person to this Senate and to the country; and that is that a measure shall be considered by the President in the performance of his constitutional duties one year, and then that it shall be hung up in the legislative department another whole year, and in the interval to be the subject of popular consideration and of popular elections in the country, and then be passed upon at the next session by only one department of the Government without any action of the President whatever, without hearing him upon the question at the time when it is to be finally acted upon and disposed of. We cannot, however, change the course of action on that subject now. It has taken place. I only speak of this in order to express my objection against adopting this policy or course of action hereafter, and the hope that we shall amend our course of conduct in this respect.

I say, then, that these measures undisposed of are to be brought up, I presume, at this session for our consideration. I think the Senate ought to require, ought to demand of the Senator from Ohio that he shall take these subjects in the order in which they were introduced, in the order in which they were considered at the former session. I agree that there is great force in the remark of the Senator from Ohio, that those persons who are here claiming membership in our body are reasonably entitled to have their case heard and determined. It was a reasonable claim any day at the last session after this veto was sent to us; I believe it is a reasonable claim at this time, and I for one am ready to vote to take up these cases in their proper and natural order, in a reasonable manner, and act upon them; and if the Senator from Ohio is able to obtain his two-thirds vote against my opinion let him have it; but every consideration demands prompt action.

At present, however, I shall vote against taking up the Nebraska bill because I think that the other measure ought to have precedence, and that we ought to insist on its consideration first.

Mr. WADE. I do not like to be skirmishing on the outside of this question any longer; but as gentlemen endeavor to put me in a position inconsistent with myself, and might, perhaps, make an impression on the Senate that my course in regard to these bills needed some explanation, I shall be pardoned for again trespassing on the Senate. To gentlemen who have been in the Senate all the while, any explanation from me is unnecessary. We expect that certain gentlemen will resort to all the subtleties that legislation permits to stave off and get rid of a measure the political bearings of which they do not like. That is natural enough; and I make no objection to it; but who ever before heard that a Senator at the head of a committee having two or three propositions in charge had not the right to bring them forward in the order that the committee directed, or if they did not direct him, in the order that his own judgment might dictate? Why is it that gentlemen on the other side insist that one of these propositions has the right of priority over the other? They are against both, I understand. So far as their votes are concerned, it will make no difference what is the order in which the measures are considered.

A word now as to the course of proceeding at the last session on the Colorado bill. The Senator from Indiana says that I was inconsistent with myself; for I first made an argument against the admission of Colorado, and afterward voted for it. That is true; I did speak against it at first, because upon the data that I had in my possession at that time I did not think it was proper that she should be admitted. The question was comparatively a new one, and we had not very much light on the subject. On further consideration, and after new light had been presented, I became satisfied that the course which I had taken was wrong, and that Colorado was really entitled to admission as a State. I gave my reasons for both of these opinions, and the gentleman was perfectly at liberty to take the one that he thought the most of. I suppose he thought my first argument was the best; or at any rate, the light which I thought sufficient to convince me that I ought to change, did not convince him. But was there anything wrong on my part? When the facts and circumstances which came before me convinced me that I had acted without sufficient light, and on further consideration it became apparent to me, at all events, that this Territory was sufficient in inhabitants, that she had all the elements of self-government, and ought to be admitted into the Union as a State upon the same principle that all other Territories had been since I have been in the Senate, I ask if I was guilty of any wrong? There is not a single principle which has been presented in argument against the admission of Colorado and Nebraska as States now, that might not have been urged against almost every other Territory that has been admitted as a State since I have had a seat in this body.

I believe now that with the light I had originally my first argument was right; and I think also that on the further light I received my second position was also right. That is my judgment, but it is not the judgment of the Senator from Indiana.

But the Senator says that after the veto message of the Colorado bill came in it was not immediately taken up. Well, sir, the explanation is very simple. The strength to carry my side of the question did not seem to be here; I did not think there would be a fair trial then. Now, my rule is this: I will never be for a measure unless I think it is right; but even when I believe a measure is right I shall not urge it when in my judgment it is apparent that the Senate is not in a condition to give my side a fair hearing. If that doctrine is wrong, I am wrong. I would move to-day to postpone this bill, which I am zealously in favor of, if I believed that we could not consider it to as much advantage now as we could a week hence. If there is anything wrong in that course of action, I am willing to submit to correction.

But, sir, let me say to the Senator from Indiana that I do not propose to take up the veto message at all, because new light has come before our eyes showing the propriety of the admission of Colorado, and showing it, as I believe, to the President of the United States so that, on the presentation of a new bill, he will be very glad to let it pass without his veto. I have no doubt of it. I do not know that it is so; I express no opinion on that point; but I know that if the President shall object to the admission of Colorado into the Union to-day, upon the facts and circumstances which will be presented, he will do that which no other President has ever done. I do not believe that he will do it. I believe that if you were to consult him to-day you would find it to be his wish that we should present him a new Colorado bill, so that he would give it fresh consideration, and, as I believe, he would not veto it. Upon that hypothesis I have introduced a new bill. I hope now that gentlemen will understand the reason that has induced me to take the course I have seen fit to take, both at this session and at the former session.

Now, what is the difference between these two bills, one for Nebraska and one for Colorado? They are both before us. If gentlemen would let us get at them, would not stand here to debate longer than they can give light on the subject, my judgment is that during the day we can pass them both. They stand here together. I have moved to take up the Nebraska bill first, more from accident, perhaps, than anything else. I am anxious to take up and consider both.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio that I was not aware that he had introduced a new bill in relation to Colorado.

Mr. WADE. I have.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire the statement I have just made to go in connection with my former remarks.

Mr. WADE. I hope we shall have a vote on the question. I sincerely hope that both bills may be taken up and disposed of to-day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] omitted to notice a very potential argument which has been offered in favor of the present consideration of the bill for the admission of Nebraska—I allude to the argument presented by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] that Nebraska had sent Republican Senators here. This certainly is a very grave argument; it is worthy of the most serious consideration, and should not be lightly passed over! Nebraska, having sent Republican Senators here, their votes being necessary for the accomplishment of some purpose beyond, as has been intimated in the course of this debate, does it not become our duty, to be consistent with ourselves, to hasten on her admission? We were told yesterday, during the course of the debate on the bill to regulate suffrage in this District, that it was advocated because the votes of the negro portion of the population of the District of Columbia were necessary. It has been intimated to-day that the votes of the Senators from Nebraska may be necessary for the accomplishment of some object that is to come in the future.

Now, sir, the Senate of the United States ought to be consistent with itself. If it was necessary to pass the negro suffrage bill because the negro votes were needed, and therefore it was done, and it is now necessary to pass the bill for the admission of Nebraska because she has sent Republican Senators, let us be consistent, let us have a clean record. But there is this question which suggests itself to my mind; suppose Nebraska instead of sending Republican Senators here had sent Democratic Senators here, then the reason would not have applied, I apprehend, so powerfully; we should not have been addressed, I presume, so earnestly for the present consideration of this bill. I should like to have heard my very able friend from Pennsylvania meet these great and weighty arguments, and I now should like to hear him. I confess that I myself am unable to meet them, but I know that my friend from Pennsylvania can do it if he will.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President I hope I shall be pardoned if I make one word of reply to the Senator from Ohio. He seemed to think that his argument was advanced by personal allusions to myself. If I understand him, he sought to show an inconsistency on my part.

Mr. WADE. Yes, I think I did.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says yes, he thinks he did. Very well, that will justify me then in one moment's reply. I am at a loss to understand how the Senator can find any inconsistency on my part if he takes the trouble to understand the facts. He assumed that I voted for the admission of Tennessee. I have sent for the Journal of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. No; I did not say you did. When you said you did not I gave it up.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I have sent for the Journal of the Senate and my name will be found recorded on all the yeas and nays, and they were very numerous, that were taken against the admission of Tennessee; and I at that time assigned the reason, because it contained the word "white" in its constitution.

Mr. WADE. You voted for the constitutional amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says I voted for the constitutional amendment. I did vote for the constitutional amendment; but I should like to ask the Senator whether he considers himself bound now to admit one of these rebel States if it refuses the suffrage to freedmen. I should like to ask my friend to answer that.

Mr. WADE. No; I do not.

Mr. SUMNER. I knew he did not.

Mr. WADE. I do not know that I understand the Senator. Let me say that I should consider myself bound by the constitutional amendment if the southern States complied with it within a reasonable time, and that reasonable time, in my judgment, is nearly elapsed. By a reasonable time I mean as soon as their Legislatures can consider it. If they adopt the constitutional amendment, and comply with the terms prescribed by the reconstruction committee and adopted by Congress, I should feel bound to vote for their admission. I voted for the constitutional amendment on that hypothesis.

Mr. SUMNER. Even with the word "white" in their constitutions?

Mr. WADE. Without regard to that.

Mr. SUMNER. Without regard to the rights of the freedmen?

Mr. WADE. On complying with the requisitions of the constitutional amendment I should vote for them.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not agree with the Senator, and I distinctly stated when that proposition was under discussion that I did not accept it as a finality; that I was not in any respect bound by it; that so far as I had a vote on this floor I would insist that every one of these States, before their Representatives were received in Congress, should confer impartial suffrage, without distinction of color. I insisted upon that at the time, and therefore I ask my friend what inconsistency is there on my part now when I insist upon the same rule with regard to Nebraska.

Mr. WADE. I cannot see how the Senator could have misled the southern States with that. When they complied with all we asked of them in the constitutional amendment I supposed we could not refuse to let them in on those terms. If the Senator did not intend that they should have the benefit of what we had done by compliance with the terms on their part it seems to me there was something wrong. I intended to let them in on the terms we prescribed. I did not ask more, and I would not be satisfied with less; and if now they should comply with them it would be bad faith in me to refuse to admit them. Certainly, I am as much for colored suffrage as any man on this floor, but when I make such an agreement as that I stand by it always.

Mr. SUMNER. Sir, the Senator says, "when I make an agreement I stand by it." I accept the language of the Senator; when I make an agreement I stand by it. I made no such agreement as the Senator attributes to me, and I do not understand that the Senate or that Congress made any such agreement. I know that certain politicians and certain editors have undertaken to foist such an agreement into that proposition of constitutional amendment. It was never so declared. I believe that the committee on reconstruction reported a resolution to that effect, but they never called it up, and I know very well that I offered a resolution in this Chamber expressly disavowing any such agreement.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The committee on reconstruction reported a resolution that if each State should adopt this amendment and the amendment should become a part of the Constitution, be adopted by a sufficient number of States, that then the States might be accepted. That was what they reported.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was a bill.

Mr. WADE. That was the understanding I alluded to.

Mr. BROWN. That was not acted upon.

Mr. SUMNER. It was not acted on. It was never passed. I suppose that those who had it in charge did not venture to invite a vote upon it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was laid on the table by a vote in the House of Representatives upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; that is not in my memory now. I do not doubt, however, that it was so laid on the table in the other House. What is the natural consequence of that? It never became in any respect a legislative act. Nobody entered therefore legislatively into any such agreement as the Senator from Ohio attributes to me. How he could attribute it to me in the face of my constant asseveration on this floor that I would not be a party to any such agreement surpasses my comprehension.

Now, if I understood the Senator, I have answered his two charges of inconsistency against me, first with regard to the admission of Tennessee, and secondly with regard to the constitutional amendment. That part of the Senator's speech therefore falls to the ground.

So far as the Senator entered upon the merits of the question I will not now make any reply. There may be a time for that, if the subject should be taken up and we should enter upon its consideration, although I should say now that I have no desire to occupy the attention of the Senate on this subject. I however must enter my most earnest protest against the measure. To my mind it is one of the most disastrous measures that has been introduced into Congress. I use my words advisedly; I say it is disastrous because it will impair the moral efficiency of Congress, injure its influence, and be something like a bar against the adoption of just measures for the rebel States. Sir, we are now seeking to obliterate the word "white" from all institutions and constitutions there; and yet Senators here, with that great question before them, rush swiftly forward to admit a new State with the word "white" in its constitution. In other days we all united, or many of us did—and the Senator from Ohio was among the number—in saying "No more slave States!" I now insist upon another cry: "No more States with the word 'white' in their constitutions!" On that question I part company with my friend from Ohio. He is now about to welcome them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill to admit Nebraska as a State of this Union.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—yeas 21, noes 11; and the bill (S. No. 466) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It recites that on the 21st day of March, 1864, Congress passed an act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and offered to admit the State when so formed into the Union upon compliance with certain conditions therein specified; and it appears that the people of Nebraska have adopted a constitution which, upon due examination, is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of that act, and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union. It is therefore proposed to enact that the constitution and State government which the people of Nebraska have formed for themselves be and is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the State of Nebraska shall be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever. The State of Nebraska is declared to be entitled to all the rights, privileges, grants, and immunities, and to be subject to all the conditions and restrictions of an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nebraska to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved April 19, 1864.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other right on account of color or race, but all persons shall be equal before the law; and the people of the Territory shall, by a majority of the voters thereof, at such places and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Governor thereof, declare their assent to this fundamental condition. The Governor shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic statement of such assent whenever the same shall be given, upon the receipt whereof, he shall, by proclamation, announce the fact, whereupon without any further proceedings on the part of Congress this act shall take effect.

Mr. WADE. I do not propose to go into a lengthy discussion of this subject, but I wish to make the Senate acquainted with some of the facts and circumstances relating to Nebraska and the condition in which it is at the present time. It will not take me long to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the question now before the Senate is on the amendment.

Mr. WADE. The question is on the amendment, to be sure, but I suppose what I have to say will relate as much to the amendment as to the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object at all. I only wanted to know whether the Senator wished to discuss the amendment as well as the bill.

Mr. WADE. Only generally. What I have to say will be as germane to the general bill as to this particular amendment, but I may as well say it now. Before, however, I proceed to consider the subject before us, I am very anxious to be understood on the question that arose between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself.

When the committee on reconstruction, at the last session, brought in their last proposition to amend the Constitution and to provide for the readmission of the seceded States, the labors of that committee I supposed had been directed to the inquiry upon what conditions we should permit those States to come back into the Union. I supposed it was for that purpose the committee was raised. I supposed they had directed all their inquiries to that subject, and that they had settled down upon amendments to the Constitution, which were to be submitted to the seceded States, and upon being adopted and complied with by them in good faith, and being ratified by three fourths of all the States, would entitle them to representation in the two Houses.

I supposed it was on that very condition that we sought to permit them to come back. It would seem to be an inconsistency to say that if classes of people were excluded from the ballot-box they should not be entitled to be counted in the basis of representation, that is that political power should be based upon voters, if we did not mean to leave it in the power of the States to exclude some class of people from the ballot-box. The provision was that where the States excluded any class from the right to vote, that class should be excluded from the basis of representation. Everybody knew that that was meant for the colored men in the southern country, and the object was to provide that if the southern States shut them out and would not permit them to vote we would not allow those States to count those men in making up the basis upon which their representation should be apportioned. And yet the honorable Senator tells us that he had no idea that anybody was to be excluded. If so the provision would have been senseless, without operation or effect. If we were not going to permit the States when in the Union to exclude anybody from the ballot-box, why make such a stipulation as that? I cannot understand it in any other way than that when three fourths of the States ratified that amendment, and made it a part and parcel of the Constitution of the United States, the southern States would then be in such a condition that they might apply here, and all other things being equal they would be admitted. Of course they must send loyal men; they must send men who can take the oath; but all these conditions being complied with they should be received. If we did not mean that, I do not know what we did mean. Why provide for what should happen on the exclusion of a certain class from the ballot-box, if we did not intend to allow them to be excluded under any circumstances.

I will say in this connection, as we have begun to define our positions here, that I think that proposition was perfectly fair, temperate, judicious, moderate beyond what the world had ever seen before under such circumstances; and if the southern people throw it back defiantly in our teeth and will not comply with it, I am willing to say here that I am for putting them under the strong arm of military power, and ruling them in that way, if it be necessary, so that they shall make no disturbance in this Government. If they will take the terms we offer in a reasonable time I am bound to stand up to my agreement.

Mr. CRESWELL. How long is a reasonable time?

Mr. WADE. When their Legislatures have met and taken the question into consideration, or refuse to consider it at all. Certainly we cannot expect them to reject it until they have had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. CRESWELL. Four or five have rejected it already.

Mr. WADE. They are in the last category I laid down, subject to that rule which I stand ready here to enforce upon them.

Now, Mr. President, one reason why the Territory of Nebraska should be very soon admitted as a State is that the land there is being taken up by your college scrip, by your railroad grants, &c. In various ways the land is being all absorbed, so that if we leave it a little while longer exposed in this way we shall not have the power to give to the State for school purposes and for various other purposes those grants which we have uniformly made to new States on their admission into the Union. We shall deprive them of the privilege of receiving these grants and ourselves of the power to deal with this new State on the conditions that we have dealt with every other Territory which has been admitted as a State. This is one great reason why we should do this act at once, and permit them to avail themselves of the same advantages we have always bestowed upon others in like circumstances.

The next question that generally arises in considering these subjects is whether the Territory applying for admission has a sufficient amount of population to entitle it to admission into the Union. As I said here once before, there has been no uniform rule as to the number of inhabitants that entitle a Territory to admission into the Union. Sometimes the number has been more and sometimes less; but scarcely ever has it been the fact that a Territory has had enough inhabitants to entitle it to one Representative in the House of Representatives, according to the then existing ratio. I hardly know of any Territory that has had that number of inhabitants when it has applied for admission and has been admitted. We have looked rather to the capabilities of the Territory, its means of sustaining a population, the facility with which it is filling up with population, what will probably be its condition in a short time. The people of the new States and their Representatives generally being in harmony with the great interests of the country, and ready to act and vote in accordance with the principles of progress on which the American Union is founded for the benefit of all, it has not been considered a question of very great moment to fix the particular number of their population at the time of admission into the Union. I know the disparity which exists between great States like New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio and these new States whose Representatives are brought into this body on exactly equal terms. So far as population is concerned, there is a great and mighty disparity in the condition of things. It seems somewhat hard that a small State should have the same power in this body as a large one with five or six or eight times its population; but nevertheless that was one of the fundamental principles on which the Government was organized. Nobody has found fault with it practically. The reason why this inequality has been submitted to with very little opposition I have already suggested: the interests of all harmonize and they act together. What benefits one benefits the other.

Although the State of Ohio has a population of about three millions she has no more voice in this body than a State having one tenth that population; and yet the Senators of the smaller State have the same great views of government and the same great interests to protect, and the result is that we act in harmony and the disparity is not felt. If we were from different nations, with different religions to maintain and different interests to support, this inequality that exists and ever has existed in the Senate would be perfectly unbearable. As it is, it creates no hardship upon anybody. We are harmonious, we act alike, and all act, I trust, for the great interests of all.

Now, what is the number of inhabitants in this Territory? There has been an examination made by the Bureau of Statistics, and they make out that it has a population of eighty-eight thousand five hundred and thirty, and that was last April.

Mr. GRIMES. What bureau is that?

Mr. WADE. The Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, who were ordered to make out, as well as they could, the number of inhabitants. I have no doubt that that estimate is much below the mark. They gave a vote of nine thousand one hundred and thirty-six at the October election. The votes in these remote Territories, so large in extent, are a very uncertain guide as to the number of inhabitants.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Has the Senator the basis of that calculation? How did the Bureau of Statistics arrive at that result, and on what information?

Mr. WADE. They were directed, as I understand, to ascertain the number of inhabitants, as well as they could, in collecting the taxes there. It was not a census strictly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There was no census taken.

Mr. WADE. No; I do not claim that. This is what we derive from the bureau as being their estimate, from the best guides they had.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As there is no per capita tax, how did the bureau ascertain?

Mr. WADE. I do not profess that it is strictly correct, but it is the best light we can get from those having the best opportunities of ascertaining.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator whether there has been any census taken since 1860?

Mr. WADE. Not that I know of.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The population was then about twenty-seven thousand.

Mr. WADE. I do not think there has been any census taken since that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was the last vote?

Mr. WADE. Nine thousand one hundred and thirty-six; and I was going on to say that the vote in these Territories is a very uncertain guide in forming a conclusion as to the number of the inhabitants. The population, we know, is very much scattered; they have to go a great way to get to the places where the votes are given in. Persons going into a new Territory are very much engaged in their own pursuits, and it is a great deal more of a job for them to get to the polls and vote than it is in more populous regions where the precincts are small and the voting places are convenient. For this reason the number of votes furnishes no safe guide as to the amount of population.

I have here the report of the Director of the Bureau of Statistics, arriving at the conclusion which I have stated, and I have no doubt it is an underestimate. This report was made up from data furnished by the officers of the internal revenue in that Territory, and it was made out on facts collected in April last. Since then population has gone in, and the country has filled up faster, perhaps, than almost any Territory ever has done. I suppose there are now several thousand more people in Nebraska than there were at the time this calculation was made.

They have as much as three hundred miles of railroad in Nebraska to-day, running through toward the Rocky mountains, and there is another railroad approaching the Territory from another quarter, and which is to go right through it, although it has not yet got very far in the Territory. It has all the facilities for growing up into a great and flourishing State. It has a great extent of arable and fertile land. Its railroad facilities, its facilities for market, the navigation afforded by the Missouri river, all these circumstances give it as favorable a position as almost any other Territory that has knocked at your door for admission and has been admitted.

At the election on the constitution the vote for admission was 3,988, and the vote against it was 3,838, being a majority of 100 in favor of the proposition. That vote was taken during the summer, in harvest time, when the men were engaged at work, and did not turn out to vote. It was taken a year ago, I think.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When we were here during the last session.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable Senator from Ohio will permit me to ask here whether the nine thousand one hundred and thirty-six votes which he says were given were the whole number of votes cast?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; the whole number of votes cast at the October election.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will he tell me now how many were for the constitution, and how many against it?

Mr. WADE. That was not the vote on the constitution. That vote was taken over a year ago, and was less than eight thousand altogether.

Mr. COWAN. Was there not a vote on the constitution recently?

Mr. WADE. Not recently.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Just about a year ago at this time.

Mr. COWAN. And it failed once in Nebraska.

Mr. WADE. They had two votes on it.

Mr. COWAN. On the last vote there was one hundred majority for a State.

Mr. WADE. I can state here what I am informed on that subject. I am informed that there are a great many Mexicans in the Territory, scattered about, and they are generally opposed to a State government. They do not want to come into the Union as a State.

Mr. HENDRICKS. You are thinking of Colorado.

Mr. WADE. No; there are some here. There are some in Colorado, but there are a few in Nebraska. We will talk about Colorado when it comes up, that seems to be in gentlemen's minds more than Nebraska a good deal. The population at all events, on the best evidence we have, is certainly much larger than that of several Territories which have been admitted as States; I think I may say more than most of them when they were admitted into the Union. I believe the population of Nebraska to-day is as large as that of the State of Florida. This people as I have said once before are a loyal people and will be the foundation of perhaps one of the best States in this Union. And I will say too that I traveled up through there myself this fall. I saw everything active and in motion there. Omaha is one of the most flourishing towns I have seen in a great while. The evidence of enterprise there is as great as it is in any city I have ever been in. It is all flourishing. Their railroad establishment for the construction of cars and engines and everything else they require is one of the best. It is not completed yet, but they have progressed with it to a great extent and laid out a great amount of money there, and I know of no part of the country that appears to be more enterprising, more flourishing, and filling up faster with inhabitants than the Territory of Nebraska.

Now, can anybody tell me why we should single her out and keep her out of the Union? The Senator from Massachusetts undertakes to tell us why we should go against it and keep it out. Why? Because he has interposed a new principle. Was a State ever before excluded on this ground? Not at all. The Senator will not pretend that this ever was made an objection to any other State or Territory. What position should I be in here arguing against the admission of this State on the ground that they had the word "white" in their constitution? Sir, the State of Ohio has the word "white" in her Constitution. I intend to do all I can to induce the people of Ohio to eradicate it and to give every man the same equal rights; but I will not stand here as a Senator from Ohio objecting to the admission of a new State with a constitution like that of Ohio in this respect.

It is unjust to establish now for the first time a rule of this kind to operate against a Territory which has complied with all the requirements which have ever been imposed on any other Territory seeking admission into the Union as a State. It is unjust to exclude her upon a new idea got up after the enabling act was passed. When you passed the enabling act, why did you not direct that she should make a constitution excluding the word "white"?

Mr. SUMNER. May I remind my friend that by the enabling act the constitution must be republican in form?

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask my friend whether a constitution which makes a discrimination in rights on account of color is republican in form? Is it a republican government?

Mr. WADE. I should not like to say that the State from which I come was not republican in form, in substance, and in every way. I have said, however, that a State lacks republican elements just in so far as she excludes portions of her population from the elective franchise. There is but a very small part of the population of Nebraska excluded. It is a defect in the constitution in my judgment. So it is in my own State, and there I shall labor to eradicate it, and I have no doubt the people of Ohio will do so very soon. I have just as little doubt that Nebraska will do so, too, if you admit her. I am told by her Senators, I am told by her Delegate, I am assured by all the people I see from there, that there is no doubt they are as faithful to this great principle as any of us, and that they will immediately turn their attention to correcting this defect. It is merely a defect in form, for there are but very few colored persons there, as I understand; I do not know how many, but probably not fifty in the whole Territory. But, whether they be few or many, I agree that they are entitled to their rights; and they will get their rights quicker if you permit the State to come into the Union now than they will if you exclude her. I do not know what the effect will be if you thrust back these patriotic people who have vindicated your rights and mine by their dearest blood; if you scout them from your Halls of Congress, and fasten conditions upon them you have never required of any other Territory. You never apprised them that you would insist upon the condition you now propose to require. It would have been well to give them notice beforehand that it was expected that they should comply with this condition. If you had, they would have done it; but we all of us, until very lately, voted for the admission of Territories without an observation and without a thought of an objection for any such reason as this.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think I misled the Senator in regard to the time when the vote on this constitution was taken. I understand that it was in June last. I thought it was about a year ago, but I understand now that it was in June last.

Mr. WADE. I thought it was earlier than that; I did not remember the date.

The pending amendment proposes to attach a condition to the admission of this State. I do not know whether you can do that. She ought to be admitted, if at all, on the same footing with all the other States. Up to this hour the regulation of the elective franchise has been regarded as a State question. It belongs, under the Constitution as it now stands, exclusively to the States of the Union. We have not proposed to take it away from any State. This State has never yet committed an act by which she forfeited her rights. If a State has raised her hand against your Constitution, if by rebellion she has forfeited her right to exist, she has then placed herself in a position where you have a constitutional right to deal with her just as you please. But I do not know what right you have to deal in this way with a State or a Territory which has been always loyal; which has forfeited none of her rights, which has performed all of her duties. I do not know what right you have to say that a State shall be admitted, not on an equality with every other State, and shall not be allowed to regulate her elective franchise as she pleases. I say to the gentleman who offers this amendment that you have not, under the Constitution, as yet declared anywhere that the General Government can fix the status of the elective franchise. You have left it thus far with the States. The constitutional amendment that we passed last year left it to the States, even to the rebel, forfeited States, to regulate it for themselves, the only restriction being that they should not have political power for those of their population whom they excluded from the right of voting.

Of course, I am as much for the principle of the amendment as anybody else. I wish the word "white" were excluded from the constitution of my own State. But neither you, sir, nor I, nor this Congress, can do it under the Constitution of the United States. We have no power here to say to the State of Ohio, "Correct this error in your constitution or we will correct it for you." Will any gentleman contend that we can do it? I do not suppose that is contended in regard to a State which has not forfeited her rights by treason.

Mr. BROWN. Is this a State?

Mr. WADE. She asks to be a State.

Mr. BROWN. That is the very question.

Mr. WADE. Certainly, she asks to be a State, and if you make her a State at all I ask you to make her one upon the same conditions with every other State.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator whether he considers this a State now, and as thereby excluding us from this action?

Mr. WADE. Oh, no. I think, however, that in parity of reason this amendment stands upon the same grounds as if it were applied to an existing State. You ask an unusual thing. You undertake here to correct her constitution in this particular by act of Congress. You say to these people, "If you come in as a State we will fix your elective franchise." You cannot do it for a State; the moment she is in the Union you agree that she has a right to do it herself. Then, that being the case, what right have you to control her in this particular as a condition on which she shall come in? It is an unusual condition, and it is a test which has never been applied to any State. You gave this Territory no notice in your enabling act that it was necessary for her to comply with such a condition; but now, after she has made her Constitution in good faith and complied with your enabling act, you come in here and say there is another condition that we did not think of at the time, which not having been performed by you we will exclude you and not allow you to come in. I do not believe it is right.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to ask for information of the Senator from Ohio whether this Constitution is framed under and in pursuance of that enabling act?

Mr. WADE. I think it is substantially.

Mr. BROWN. In fact, I mean, is it in pursuance of that act?

Mr. WADE. I will tell you just how it was. There may be a technical distinction. The enabling act enabled the people at a certain time, naming a particular day, to meet and frame a constitution. They did meet at that time and rejected it. They afterward met, however, by the direction of their Legislature, all things being orderly and right, and complied with the requisitions of the enabling act in every respect except as to the time named. The day fixed passed by, and afterward on reconsideration they met again and adopted a State constitution, endeavoring to comply and substantially complying with all the conditions that were required of them in the enabling act.

Now, sir, I do not wish to prolong the debate, and I have but a few words more to say. The questions I have now argued have never been argued in relation to the application of any State which has been admitted since I have been in the Senate chamber unless it was in the case of Kansas, where a great controversy sprang up, but with none of the elements which we are now considering. There was an attempt made to make a constitution here in this District, and then force it upon the people of Kansas—that was called the Lecompton constitution. That gave rise to great controversy. I was opposed to the constitution that was made for that people and undertaken to be forced upon their necks. I contended against it as well as I was able and as long as I could, and finally we defeated it. The general course has been to pass an enabling act, under which the people of a Territory would assemble and make a constitution in accordance with all our constitutions, republican in form, for there is very little difference in them. There was never a better one than this of Nebraska that I have seen. It is perfectly republican in every respect except that to which the Senator from Massachusetts now objects for the first time. He would now impose a condition which has never been required of the people of any other Territory endeavoring to qualify themselves for admission as a State.

I think we shall be doing a great wrong if we interpose this new principle in the way of this people, without notice to them—a people as much in favor of equal rights as the constituents of the Senator from Massachusetts; Republican, Radical, vast majorities of them; contenders for just such a constitution as that Senator wants; but not being apprised that anything out of the beaten track was wanted, they have followed the usual course pursued by other new States. And yet they are now met by this bare abstraction, a technicality that hardly touches anybody, for there are hardly any colored men the Territory; and what few there are are as anxious for the admission of the State as I am. At least, that is true so far as I know anything of them; because they think they know that this evil will be corrected sooner by the admission than by the exclusion of the State. I hope that we shall not on this mere technicality coldly turn away a Territory comprised of patriotic men who have sacrificed so much for the Union. I do not know what the effect of it will be. For the party in power it would be the most suicidal act that any party was ever guilty of. These men, let me tell gentlemen around me, believe just as you do; they are ready to aid and assist you in carrying out your great principles of liberty, right, and justice. On their admission they will add to the power of your arm to enforce them. No party was ever so blind to the progress of its own principles as you will be if you undertake to shut out this State. It will be an act of suicide, and I should not wonder if a people thus treated would (if they were not purer than we can hardly expect human nature to be) be so indignant as to turn around—

Mr. GRIMES. And turn Copperheads?

Mr. WADE. Yes, turn Copperheads. They will not do it; but you will by such action tempt them to do it. You will be doing them a wrong that you ought not to do. It would be the most impolitic, the most suicidal act that the leaders of any great party were ever guilty of if you now thrust them out and the Representatives and Senators whom they have sent here—some of the best men in the country, approved of everybody. No better men ever knocked at your doors for admission than these gentlemen. A Senator on the other side of the House has intimated that if they were Copperheads or Democrats or something of that sort we should not be so anxious for their coming in. I do not conceal that. Even then, if they had committed no treason I might feel myself bound to let them in; but I should regret that we were to have such company. I am glad they are not of that class. I am glad they are loyal men, patriotic men, men who have been in the wars and hazarded their lives to maintain this Union. I do not think it is right now to exclude them; and I know that you will not be commended by your constituents for so suicidal an act. If there is anything that the loyal people of Ohio are in favor of to-day, it is the admission of these flourishing Territories into the Union as States to strengthen their own arm, to forward the great principles which we advocate, to help us in the great controversies that are before us, to do right and justice to a patriotic people.

Sir, I am opposed to the amendment now pending, not because I am not in favor of the principle of it, but because we have not undertaken heretofore to fix for a State—I mean a loyal State—the regulation of the elective franchise; the Constitution does not permit us to do it. It is true, as the Senator from Missouri says, Nebraska is not yet a State, but he seeks to do indirectly before she comes in that which no one here would think of doing the moment after her admission. In my judgment you ought to leave this matter to this people on the same terms that you have left it to the people of all other States. Place them under your constitutional amendment. If they exclude the colored man from the polls, those men will not be counted in the basis of representation. But I tell you the first thing they will do will be so to change their constitution as to avail themselves of all those votes. Here they are, ready, eager, anxious to adopt your constitutional amendment, and they will adopt it on the first day of the assembling of their Legislature if you give them a chance. Why should you thrust them out when every other State that has come here in exactly the same position has been admitted without any remonstrance or protest? I ask for their admission, sir. I do not wish to prolong the argument.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when the bills for the admission as States of Nebraska and Colorado were under consideration at the last session I committed myself simply by voting for them and took no part in the debate. Since that time I have looked a little more into the question, and have had some personal observation of the condition of both these Territories, and perhaps it is due to myself and the subject that I should say a few words; I do not wish to detain the Senate long.

I felt bound by the enabling act, passed by Congress on the 19th of April, 1864, to admit the people of Nebraska as a State of the Union whenever they should comply with the provisions of that law. There is now no doubt that they have complied with its provisions. No Senator can deny that the people of Nebraska have accepted our proposition in good faith. That proposition was made to them in the midst of the war, in April, 1864. We imposed the terms and conditions upon which those people might be admitted into the Union. We required no condition as to population; we required no condition as to the terms of their constitution that they have not literally complied with. Now, as a sentiment of honor, as well as of good policy, we are bound to admit these people into the Union as a State, unless there is some overriding policy or reason which would justify us in waiving this question of honor. It was on that point mainly that I cast my vote at the last session. You made them an offer; they accepted your offer; you never withdrew it; you let it stand upon the statute-book; it is there now; they have accepted it, and you cannot refuse to admit them on the conditions you yourself proposed.

It is now proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] to make an additional qualification, an additional condition. Is that fair to a people who after their struggles among themselves have finally settled down upon accepting your proposition? Is it fair now to put them to the expense of calling their convention together again to pass upon a new proposition, a new condition that was not mentioned in the original law? Certainly not. Even if I agreed with the Senator that it was wise to impose upon a State any limitation over its control of the elective franchise, I certainly would not impose that condition now, when two years ago we refused to require it. In the very law which enabled the people of Nebraska to organize a State government we limited the right of suffrage to white voters in the Territory. We authorized all those who under the territorial law could vote to vote at the election for delegates to frame the constitution; and by the territorial law, which was then upon our tables, the elective franchise was confined to the white people of the Territory, so that we authorized the white people of the Territory alone to frame this constitution. Now, shall we, after these people have complied with that condition, turn around and insist that we will not stand by our offer, but will impose other conditions? I think it is not fair to do so. It would not be fair in dealing between men, and I think it is not fair in dealing in political questions between a great nation and a community seeking to come into the Union as a State. The only conditions we imposed upon these people by the enabling act were in these words, which I read from that act:

"Said constitution shall provide, by an article forever irrevocable without the consent of the Congress of the United States:

"1. That slavery or involuntary servitude shall be forever prohibited in said State.

"2. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

"3. That the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the land belonging to residents thereof; and that no taxes shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States."

These are the three conditions that have been for many years imposed on new States. These conditions have been literally complied with in the constitution now submitted to us. I ask Senators whether, under these circumstances, it is reasonable and fair to send these people back and require an additional condition not imposed by the enabling act, compelling them to undergo the expense of again convening their convention (for that is the only way in which they can accept it), to pass upon this new proposition. Even if the proposition was important, it would not be fair and right to do so; but in my judgment it is totally unimportant, and the provision is one that these people will probably make for themselves in the course of time. When this is the case it seems to me a cruel thing to a people so poor and young as these are to impose this condition upon them and keep them out.

Mr. President, a cursory remark was made by the Senator from Massachusetts on a subject to which my colleague also alluded, and which, it seems to me, ought to be discussed more carefully at a future time; but as it is pertinent to the discussion of the nature of this enabling act I may be justified in saying a word upon it. We made a proposition to the southern States at the last session of Congress. It was made after the gravest and fullest consideration, probably that any measure ever received from any Congress of the United States. No legislative act of Congress since the foundation of this Government was surrounded with more difficult questions than the one we acted upon at the last session. After long debate, after considering all the propositions that were made on either side, the Congress of the United States made to the people of the southern States a deliberate proposition. We submitted to them constitutional amendments. It seems to me that no one can avoid the irresistible logic that if they accepted those amendments we were bound to carry them out. I know I voted for those amendments with that understanding. I felt that I would be bound by that action. I felt that if they accepted those amendments they were States in the Union, entitled to Senators and Representatives precisely like the State of Massachusetts and the State of Ohio. I did not dream that there was any doubt about that matter. And, sir, let me say to you that if the southern people had accepted, or if they do accept, the constitutional amendments, those States are just as certain to be represented here by Senators and members as the State of Ohio or the State of Massachusetts.

I know that my friend from Massachusetts, and perhaps some other Senators, were dissatisfied with the constitutional amendments. They did not meet their expectations; they did not impose the terms and conditions that they hoped to impose on the southern people; they did not probably meet their sense of duty; but still, the people of the United States have felt themselves bound by those terms; and if the southern people would now accept them, the people of the United States would hail their acceptance as the most joyful event since the surrender of Lee's army.

I believe now that that proposition made by Congress contained all that is vital, and all that is necessary to secure peace and quiet and harmony in this great country of ours. And, sir, it seems to me the saddest, the most foolish act of the southern people for them to reject the constitutional amendments. I never shall cease to grieve that the President of the United States has committed himself against that important proposition. He never could have done anything more injurious to the people of the southern States than his course encouraging them to refuse to ratify the constitutional amendments. I read this morning that the Legislature of Arkansas, in considering these amendments, among other grounds of objection, claimed that this Congress which proposed them was not the Congress of the United States, and took other grounds similar to those understood to have been held by the President. Sir, if the southern people have not yet discovered that this is the Congress of the United States, I do not know what will make them know it. They have been subdued and subjugated by acts of Congress and by the armies of the United States, acting under the authority of the acts of Congress, and a Congress composed of Senators and Representatives from those States which are now here represented.

I hope yet that that offer made by the people of the United States will be accepted by the southern States; they will have an opportunity this winter to do it, their State Legislatures are convening and acting upon it; but if they do not accept it, then what is left for us? We have either got to be ruled by those people, or we have got to rule them; and when that choice comes, I prefer to rule them. I say that sooner than allow the States recently in rebellion to come into these Halls with increased political power, arrogant and domineering, banishing loyal people from among them, overriding even the Constitution and laws of the United States, denying protection to the people who were true and loyal during the war, I will keep them out. If they come in that spirit I will not admit them. They shall never enter here until they have entirely changed their tone and manner. They will drive the people of the northern States, unwillingly as they are, to organize new governments there, and they will have to submit to those governments, whether they are organized upon the black basis or the white basis or the loyal basis. We have made them a liberal offer; if they reject it it is their own fault, not ours. We have made them an offer which, in the judgment of foreign nations and in the judgment of our own people, is moderate, reasonable, and fair.

And allow me to say that when we made our appeal to the people of the United States in the recent elections nothing gave us such strength as the moderation of the constitutional amendment. I never heard a man, either on the stump or in the forum, successfully deny that it was fair in all its parts and reasonable in all its terms. We were divided here somewhat upon the terms and conditions, the language and phraseology of the amendment, but the result of our deliberations was a proposition which, by the judgment of the American people, was such a one as we ought to have made to our brothers who had been in error. I never heard a Democrat or anybody else who could controvert it. Indeed, they generally avoided the issue. They talked about our want of power to impose it, but they never did and never would fairly and fully discuss the merits of the constitutional amendment. We can stand upon it; we did stand upon it, and went to our people upon it. Whatever may have been said in other States, in Ohio it was the only question. Our Union convention passed no other resolution except to approve and ratify the constitutional amendment. Our party went before the people on that amendment, rejecting all minor issues; and we all understood, without an exception, that if that amendment was adopted by the southern people it was the end-all and be-all of reconstruction, and that Senators and Representatives from those States were to be admitted into Congress; and we all cited, as an evidence of the intention of Congress on that subject, the actual fact of the admission of the State of Tennessee, following her adoption of the constitutional amendment. After Tennessee had adopted the constitutional amendment we set the example of admitting her promptly. The people of the State of Ohio, at least, understood that if any State in the South accepted this constitutional amendment its Senators and Representatives should take their seats by our side. But this is aside from the question before us, although it grows out of the remarks made in the course of the debate.

I have said that I would rest my vote on this bill solely upon the fact that Congress had passed an enabling act, and that the people of Nebraska had substantially complied with its terms. It is sometimes said, and it was said in the debate at the last session, that at the first vote the people of Nebraska rejected the proposition to admit them as a State. If they did so, and the offer of Congress was withdrawn, or if, from the nature of things, it was an offer that had to be accepted or rejected at once, probably that argument might hold good. It might be like the offer of an individual in the making of a contract, and the offer being rejected might be considered as withdrawn. But here was a continuing offer standing upon the statute-book, and these people were allowed to go on and hold election after election, involving the admission of the State of Nebraska without objection, and the power conferred by Congress was never withdrawn.

It is said that upon the final vote the majority was very small. So it was; but, sir, the vote was not against the admission of Nebraska. That was not simply the question in the recent election in the Territory of Nebraska. It was a political controversy growing somewhat out of the position of the political power. The Democrats in Nebraska, many of them, voted against the admission of Nebraska because they did not like the present political status of the Territory of Nebraska. Without going out of the record I can probably say that I know the fact that many Democrats in Nebraska desire the admission of the State on its own merits, but they desire to have the organization of the State government themselves, or what is more potent, many of them desire that the executive authority now exercised in the Territory of Nebraska may be continued, and that they may have the political power and patronage of the executive authorities in the Territory of Nebraska.

We know very well that in the adoption of a State government the question merely of the admission of the State is very rarely the chief question. The chief question is a question between parties; and upon this political or partisan question the majority in Nebraska was very small; but on the question of the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union I have no doubt, from all the information that I can gather, that four fifths of the people of Nebraska, without regard to party, are in favor of it. It is true the Democratic portion of the people might desire to have it postponed in the hope that in the changes of political parties in this country they would have the organization of the State government, and they might therefore vote against the admission of Nebraska for the time being; but upon the question of the formation of a State government in Nebraska there is no doubt about the sentiment of the people of Nebraska. Here, then, is an offer made by Congress and accepted by the people of Nebraska in the very terms in which it was made. Now, upon what ground can Senators refuse to allow this State to take its place here, a place that we have tendered to it? They have elected Senators and Representatives; they have gone through the form of a convention; they have submitted the action of their legislative body to the people; the people have ratified that action; here is their constitution, Republican in form, complying in all respects with the terms and conditions imposed by you. Now, how can you refuse their admission? I say that upon this ground alone I should feel bound to vote for the admission of Nebraska, even if I had not voted for the enabling act.

But, sir, it is commonly said that the population of Nebraska is not sufficient. Let us examine that. There is no law fixing the population. The general idea prevails, and probably it is a correct one in the main, that a new Territory proposing to be admitted into the Union ought to have a representative population equivalent to what is necessary to elect one Representative in Congress; but that rule has never been enforced. It has been talked about, but it has never been made a condition. You did not make it a condition when you passed the enabling act. You did not require a census to be taken; you did not require the inhabitants to be numbered to ascertain that fact. Is it right now to impose that condition? But, sir, I say to you the evidence is conclusive that Nebraska this day has more population than any but three of the States that ever were admitted into this Union. The best evidence we have before us is that Nebraska in April last had something like fifty thousand. The recent immigration during the last year was about thirty-seven thousand, according to their mode of computing. Perhaps it is not exactly accurate. We cannot tell whether it was five hundred more or one thousand less, because in a new Territory like that they cannot accurately count the waves and mutations in population. But at the election in October last, over nine thousand one hundred votes were cast, and nobody could vote at the election unless he had been a resident of the territory six months and established a residence under the law.

All who went in there during the last summer—a great mass of people, because it was observable everywhere that the population was turning from the East to the West; the war was over and people were going there in large numbers—were excluded, and yet, excluding the immigration of last summer there were over nine thousand one hundred voters, indicating a population of at least fifty thousand upon those voters. But from an actual investigation made by a bureau of the Government perhaps not friendly to the admission of the State of Nebraska, made by a gentleman of opposing politics, the new head of that bureau, made upon statistical information that enabled him to arrive substantially at the conclusion of population, he estimates the population at eighty-eight thousand. That is more than any State but three that have ever been admitted into this Union had at the time of its admission. I have no doubt they have more than that, but we have no official data on which to place it. But admitting that it is eighty-eight thousand, admitting that this gentleman's statements are substantially reliable, let us see the population that other States had when admitted into the Union. Georgia, which was one of the original States, contained at the time she came into the Union and finally agreed to the Constitution, 82,548; Vermont had 85,580; Kentucky had but 73,077; Tennessee had but 77,000; Ohio had but 41,000, and even upon the basis of representation then she had not enough for one Representative.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, yes; the basis then was 37,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I am mistaken in that. It has been very much increased since. But why do Senators talk about the basis? There is no law requiring it. You never made such a law; you never proposed such a law; and a majority of the States that have been admitted recently contained no such population, as I shall show. Louisiana had 76,000; Indiana had 68,000; Mississippi had 75,000; Illinois had 84,000, which was less even than the basis in those old times; Missouri had 66,000; Arkansas had 52,000; Florida had 54,000; Iowa had 81,000. This table does not give the population of Kansas, but there was great controversy at the time of the admission of Kansas about her population.

Mr. POMEROY. We had 107,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe Minnesota also was admitted with a large population, and I think Wisconsin had a large population. They withheld their application until they were entitled, I think, to two Representatives, perhaps three.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Three.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have shown you that this rule of population has not been an invariable rule; that all the States I have named when admitted had less population than Nebraska now has. But, sir, that is not all. Population is only one mode of ascertaining whether a State is prepared for admission. In every other respect Nebraska is far beyond the condition in which those States were when they were admitted. When Ohio was admitted with her forty thousand inhabitants her beautiful plains were covered with an unbroken forest; there was only a settlement here and there; cabins pretty far in the wilderness; no roads, no modes of communication, no schools, no colleges, no opportunities of reaching there. And so when all these other States were admitted they had none of the resources, none of the elements of civilization that this rising Territory has. Nebraska, on the contrary, is open for the settlement of the whole country; railroads now touch its eastern border; the Missouri river passes along its whole eastern border; and a railroad, built partly by the Government of the United States, has already penetrated into it two hundred and eighty miles. They have schools; they have the foundation of colleges; they have all the educational facilities of this modern age. They can be reached from this very point in two or three days, and in a few days more the railroads across Iowa will be built, and then they can be reached in a comparatively few hours. There is a country all ready for the hand of labor, with thousands of square miles almost ready for the plow, a soil rich in agriculture, rich in resources, easy of access, with a population hardy, industrious, and patriotic to the last degree. Shall you deny these people admission here when you have invited them in, when they have complied with your condition, because they have not sufficient population, when you have never made that a test as to any other State?

Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to dwell further upon this question of population which has been made by many Senators a ground of objection. If there is any force in the objection, it is one that will be rapidly overcome. Since the conclusion of the war immigration is flowing in rapidly. During the war all the Territories were suspended in growth. It was a remarkable fact that Colorado, perhaps Nebraska, and Kansas, I think, as well as all the western Territories, were either made the scene of war, or the population, young and active and enterprising, that went there flowed back into the channels of war. Nebraska and Colorado were among the first to send their young men, their best and active men into our service. Colorado organized a regiment and sent it to New Mexico, and probably saved us millions of dollars in the conquest of New Mexico. The men of Nebraska were nearly all young men. Old men do not go to these new Territories. Young men desiring to better their condition go there. The blast of the bugle brought thousands of young men from Nebraska into Iowa and then into the seat of war. No wonder the growth of their population was checked, because the life of their population was in the service of their country. Will you make that a reason for keeping them out when you know that the current has changed, that population is now pouring in there instead of out, and the population they had there was mostly engaged in the service of their country? It seems to me it is unreasonable, and that we who profess to govern the patriotic and loyal people of this country do wrong in imposing upon these patriotic and loyal people harder conditions than have been imposed upon others in former times.

I know very well that a territorial government in a rapidly-growing community like Nebraska is a great burden, irritating constantly. Their Governor is appointed by the President. He may not have any sympathy with them, although I believe as to the Governor of Nebraska, he is in hearty sympathy with the people there; but he may not be. He controls the patronage of the Territory. He is their Governor by no vote or voice of theirs. This state of affairs is always unpleasant to a people. They like to have the choice of their own Governor, even if the office is unimportant. Their judges are appointed by the President. All the machinery of their government is simply executive and provisional. The people of the Territory elect only the Legislative Assembly. Everything, therefore, is unpleasant about a territorial government. They have not their benefit of the share of the public lands. They have not any of the facilities for improvement. Laws of a doubtful character only can be passed to organize corporations and associations. There is all the uncertainty of territorial legislation; there is the well-known corruption of territorial legislation.

Is there any reason why we should continue these people under this kind of pupillage; why we should keep them under this kind of burden, unpleasant, irritating, depending upon the President of the United States for their executive authority, upon judges appointed by him for the administration of their laws, without any opportunity to improve their Territory? Is it right or just that for any slight reason we should keep them in that condition? It is always the case that these new communities rapidly seek to get out of the state of pupillage or territorial state into the government of their own affairs. It is natural that they should do so. It seems to me that this Territory has now within itself all the elements necessary to enable its people to assume their own government. They have a hardy population; they have every advantage that we have. Why not, therefore, let them enter into the race of progress? Until this Territory is admitted as a State they cannot progress rapidly; no encouragement can be held out to them. I therefore see no harm that can result from their prompt admission.

Mr. President, is it not the interest of the United States to form as soon as possible all these infant Territories into States? What object can the United States have in holding any portion of the territory of the United States in a condition where it must be governed by executive laws or executive influence? None whatever. Who among us does not desire to see, upon reasonable and fair conditions, the admission of the southern States to their old relations to the Union? I hope we all do. What objection can we have against the gradual absorption into States of all the new Territories? We can have none whatever. When they organize their own governments they pay all their local expenses. Now a territorial government is a constant expense upon the Treasury. We appropriate this year many tens of thousands of dollars for Nebraska. If we admit Nebraska all these appropriations cease and she assumes the burden of her own government. To say that she is not rich enough to maintain a government is to say that her people do not know what they want and that they are not the best persons to judge of that. If we do not admit Colorado we have tens of thousands of dollars to appropriate for her. Why not allow them to assume their own government?

It is sometimes said that these new States have too much preponderance in the legislative power of the Government; that if they have not sufficient population for one member it gives them an undue advantage in the House of Representatives; and that with a small population they ought not to be admitted into this Senate on an equal footing with the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and other States. Perhaps that is so; but in the practice of our Government there never has been any difference of interest between the small and the large States. These western States will be governed by the same impulses and the same feelings that govern us. I never yet have seen the line of distinction drawn between the small and large States. There has been no question presented since I have been a member of this body which divided the large from the small States. There is no danger, therefore, of an undue representation. These small States are increasing rapidly in population. I have no doubt that in a very short time Nebraska will contain more population than several of the existing States. By the time the next census is taken this young State, admitted I hope by your action, will have passed in the race of population and progress many of the old States of the Union. It requires but very little time for the American people to fill up one of these new Territories. We must not treat them as if they were any different from ourselves. We must not impose conditions upon them that we would not impose upon our own people. Why should we in Ohio sneer at Nebraska for inserting the word "white" in her constitution when in Ohio we have the same provision? Why should any of the States object to her admission here because she has the word "white" inserted in her constitution when that is contained in all but a few of them, when every State but one or two makes some discrimination against the colored population? Does not everybody see that the logic of events and the progress of time will cure all these evils? And if it is an objection to the constitution of Nebraska, we have ourselves introduced it into that constitution by our own enabling act.

Mr. President, after a cursory examination of this subject, and after some knowledge of the people myself, from having passed through the whole Territory of Nebraska during the last summer, I am satisfied that it would be an act of wisdom on the part of Congress to admit them promptly as a State with their present constitution, leaving them in the future to make such reforms as may be demanded by the civilization of the age.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any discussion of the constitutional amendment; nor do I propose to enter at this time into any general discussion of the merits of this bill, but shall confine what I have to say distinctly to the amendment which is before the Senate for its action.

The Senator from Ohio has plead very strongly for what he calls justice to these people. I say, sir, that I will do justice to them when they do justice to others. He claims for them the right of representation and self-government. I say that I will give them that right of representation and self-government when they give it to others who are equally entitled to it, and not a moment before.

I do not, so far as my feeling goes, have any especial desire to exclude this new State of Nebraska from coming and taking its place in our Union. On the contrary, all of my predilections, all of my sympathies, would carry me forward to extend the hand to that infant State; all of the interests that tie together those western Commonwealths would induce me to go far, very far, to do all in my power to aid that State in accomplishing its admission into the Union. But, sir, I am not prepared here to-day, in order to accomplish that result, to do what would destroy my own self-respect, and to do what I should always feel would be a violation of my duty as an American Senator, commissioned to protect the rights of freedom in this country. Therefore, not for any purposes of delay, not as militating against this State entering into the Union, but in order that my action may be consistent with my faith, in order that I may stand clear on this record of freedom and not vote to-day for what I voted against yesterday, I have introduced this amendment, which, so far from defeating the admission of this State, will, I believe contribute more to bring it in and to render it permanently a free republic than any other action that we could take.

It has been said that this was imposing unusual and unheard of terms upon the State of Nebraska. I deny it. I represent here a State that had the same terms proposed, though not with the same object, upon it when it was admitted into this Federal Union. I say that the same character of a proviso which is now offered was placed upon the Missouri bill as a Missouri restriction when Missouri was authorized to come into this Union. I will refer to the action at that day: "A resolution providing for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on a certain condition." The constitution of the State of Missouri contained a clause which prohibited free colored persons from coming into that State. It was held that that was an invasion of the rights of men in this country and of the rights of citizens, and the Congress of the United States, therefore, before they would admit that State into this Union, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States in this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act: upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete."

I hold that there is an instance in point which justifies the action which it is now proposed to take. The men of that day who represented the States of the North—and it was by their vote that it was carried—felt that these rights of citizens had to be protected, whether the constitution of the State which offered to come in violated them or not, and finding, as they deemed, a violation of them in the constitution of the State of Missouri, they declared that the State should not come in until that was obliterated.

Now, sir, what else do I propose here to-day except to say that this State of Nebraska, when she does come in, shall come in upon the explicit ground that there shall be no denial of the rights of citizenship on the ground of color? Is that any unfair requisition upon this infant State, that it shall do justice to its own citizens, that it shall not rob them of rights that are just as dear as your rights or mine? And, sir, after having passed yesterday an act which was predicated directly on the right of all men to this suffrage, with what propriety can we come in here this Friday morning and sanction by our vote that which declares that those of a certain color shall be excluded from the suffrage? I ask you, furthermore, after having cast this vote for the admission of Nebraska, with what propriety could I go back to the State of Missouri and engage there in a canvass to strike out the same clause, perhaps, from the constitution of my own State? Would I not be met on every stump in that State with the assertion, "Why, here, when you had the power, when Congress was legislating for the Territories over which it has exclusive jurisdiction, you refused to strike this clause out." The argument would be unanswerable, and I would not dare face the people of Missouri on any such issue.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this amendment, if adopted, will delay the admission of this State for sixty days. I am advised by those who profess to know the feeling and the temper of that people that they are desirous of adopting a clause of this kind, that they would readily sanction by their vote a clause of this character as a proviso to their constitution. I say that it is perfectly feasible that that vote shall be submitted to them within thirty days from this time, or within any brief period that shall be sufficient to accomplish the preliminary legislation of carrying this bill through Congress. I say therefore that it is no argument, except the argument that you will do everlasting injustice rather than wait for sixty days. That is where the argument stands flat and square.

I propose in connection with this amendment, which was drawn somewhat hastily, to modify it hereafter before it comes to a vote so as to indicate precisely the day on which this sense of the people shall be taken there in the State of Nebraska, and the day on which the return of their vote shall be made. That will obviate the last difficulty and the last objection that can be made on that score. I do not see how the American Senate, having voted, as I say they did yesterday, the principle of the right of every man to self-government as exercised through the forms of suffrage, can refuse to vote it again here to-day in regard to the infant State of Nebraska.

Mr. President I shall insist in regard to the State of Nebraska, which professes to come here as a free State, as a State that is guaranteed to all the essential rights of freedom, upon the same terms that I shall insist in regard to the readmission of every one of these southern States. I never will, so help me God, vote for their readmission into this Federal Union until they shall blot from their constitutions the distinction which excludes the black man from the right of suffrage. And, sir, I think we might as well begin our reforms at home and in our own family; we might as well begin them in our Territories, where there is no question about the right of Congress to control this matter. I think it would be well if Senators would consider in advance where they may be placed by their legislation on this subject if they shall refuse to exercise the undoubted power which they now have. I trust, sir, that the amendment will be received with favor by the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have a sympathy with the new States and desire to vote for the admission of any State whenever I feel that I ought to do so; and it is with great reluctance that I shall vote upon this bill against the admission of Nebraska at this time. But my embarrassment is somewhat relieved by the consideration that one half of the people of Nebraska, so far as they have expressed an opinion on this subject, have said that they did not want to come in as a State. While there were but 3,938 voting for the admission, or for the constitution, there were 3,838 voting against it. My vote is not at all influenced by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. If that amendment were adopted, I surely could not vote for it at all, if every other objection were removed.

I am very much gratified, sir, and I think I may congratulate the country upon the fact, that the Senator from Ohio, who has by some been charged with illiberality, to-day upon this question of territorial rights and the rights of States has expressed those old-fashioned doctrines which governed the legislation of the country upon such questions for more than fifty years. Very often in the Senate I have heard the doctrines which he has proclaimed to-day, but indeed they were mostly urged upon this side of the Chamber, that the people of a Territory have the absolute and entire right to control their own affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the honorable Senator give way for a moment to allow me to make a motion which it is necessary should be made now?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that an error has occurred in engrossing the deficiency bill that we passed this morning. It has gone to the House, and it is necessary to get it back again in order to correct the error. A part which should not have been stricken out was stricken out, and the part which should have been stricken out was retained. I therefore offer the following resolution with a view to get it back:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, and for other purposes, for the purpose of correcting an error in the engrossment of the amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HENRY CLAY WOOD.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my friend from Indiana will allow me, I should like to make another motion, and that is, that the papers in relation to the claim of Henry Clay Wood for compensation for property lost by the evacuation of Fort Cobb, Texas, under Post Order 57, which was before the Committee on Claims, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims. I will state that I make the motion with a view to offer some additional testimony. It was reported upon adversely, and that adverse report was agreed to; but I believe it comes within the rule to refer it again in case additional testimony is offered, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now offer the additional testimony in support of the claim, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims with the other papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the motion just submitted by the Senator from Maine—I was not in my seat at the time—which was to take a claim which had been reported upon adversely, and recommit it—

Mr. HENDRICKS. As I do not want to occupy much of the time of the Senate, I would rather not take up any other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us take up the adjournment resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will consent to that, if it leads to no debate.

Mr. HOWE. I just wish to have this question settled. I call for the reading of the 50th rule. I suppose that would govern the decision of that motion. I have the rule in my hand and will read it myself:

"Whenever a claim is presented to the Senate and referred to a committee, and the committee report that the claim ought not to be allowed, and the report be adopted by the Senate, it shall not be in order to move to take the papers from the files for the purpose of referring them at a subsequent session, unless the claimant shall present a memorial for that purpose, stating in what respect the committee have erred in their report, or that new evidence has been discovered since the report, and setting forth the new evidence in the memorial."

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was no objection made, and I supposed, there being no objection, it passed by the unanimous consent of the Senate. I did not examine the papers. I stated that I wished to present new evidence, which I did, in the same way as it has been done before repeatedly to my knowledge. I submitted the new evidence on the subject. I do not know that there is a particular memorial setting forth the new evidence, but the new evidence went with the papers, or I should not have made the motion.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator knows that the evidence is important, I shall not insist on the form of a memorial; but I do not like, unless there is something important in the new evidence, to have a claim which has been reported upon adversely, again referred to the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I have said, I have not examined the papers. The new evidence presented is deemed important by the claimant.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) for the relief of Ober, Nanson & Co., merchants of New York, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DARIEN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have been waiting for an opportunity to call up the joint resolution that was displaced this morning, during the process of meeting the views of the Senators from California and Iowa. I believe there are now no objections to its passage, and it is important that it should pass at once. I trust, therefore, that the Senate will permit it to be disposed of now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will it lead to discussion?

Mr. SPRAGUE. There will be no discussion upon it. If there is, I will withdraw the request. I hope it will be taken up. It is necessary that it should pass at once. There are no objections to it as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the Senate resume the consideration of the resolution referred to by him. Another subject being before the Senate, the motion of the Senator can only be entertained by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 149) to extend aid and facilities to citizens of the United States engaged in the survey of a route for a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) for the relief of Ober, Nanson & Co., merchants of New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. GRIMES. It is very important to some members of the Senate, especially those who reside at a remote distance from the capital, that the concurrent resolution that came from the House of Representatives providing for an adjournment of Congress over the holidays should be disposed of one way or the other; and I therefore move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution to which the Senator refers was read this morning, and objection to its consideration being made, it was laid over under the rule.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Iowa can only be entertained by unanimous consent, another subject being before the Senate. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution named by the Senator from Iowa? None being made, the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand it is now before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I withdrew the objection to its present consideration at the request of several gentlemen who said that, whichever way it might be decided, it was important to them that it should be decided at once; but I did not withdraw or intend to withdraw my objection to the passage of the resolution. I cannot flatter myself for a moment that any objection that I may make with reference to it will be of any avail, for since I have been in the Senate I have found that there is no use in trying to resist a motion to adjourn over the holidays—and the holidays have been increasing ever since I have been a member; they began with the old regular holidays, and they have now got to be a fortnight or three weeks—because the motion is one that takes precedence of all others, I have found, and is considered of infinitely more importance than any other that can possibly come before the Senate. Under these circumstances I can do no more than enter a protest against it.

If gentlemen flatter themselves that there is nothing to do, or wish to convey the idea to the country that there is nothing to do, all I have to say, in the way of answer, is to appeal to what has been witnessed here to-day—a contest of an hour in the morning to ascertain which of two bills should be taken up and considered on account of the immediate and pressing importance of both of them; one of them a very long bill, the bankrupt bill, which will involve a great deal of debate, the other a bill which seemed to be launched also on something of a troubled sea. In addition to those, there is a bill lying on your table, which came from the House very early in the session, calculated to limit or to take away a certain power which was granted to the President with regard to issuing pardons, and many gentlemen considered that bill of such pressing necessity that they wished it to be taken up at once and not even referred to a committee; and I believe

I was denounced privately by some members of the Senate as obstructing the course of justice and of public business by daring to suggest that it ought to go to a committee for consideration. We have several other bills on the same subject, or at least on similar subjects, which are considered to be exceedingly necessary on this side of the Chamber, to say the least of it, on your table; and yet here is a motion at this short session to crowd everything pretty much that we have to do into the time that will be left after the 1st of January.

It may be replied—some gentlemen have in conversation replied to me—"it is probable that the bill will pass calling the next Congress together on the 4th of March, and we can then finish up what remains to be done." Everybody knows that it is not designed to do anything at that session except simply to organize the two Houses of Congress; and if we should undertake to do something at that session we have got to begin anew. Business does not go over from this Congress to that. We must go through all the forms of reporting the measures again.

I desire to say these things to justify myself for the vote which I shall give against this adjournment from Thursday next, which I believe will be the 20th, until some time in the month of January. I wish to put myself on record with regard to it, and for that purpose I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. What the Senator from Maine says is perfectly correct in theory, but we tried it in practice once and it did not work well. I shall remain here during the vacation at any rate, and therefore I shall not be affected by it. I remember that at one session we did keep Congress in session during the holidays, but we transacted no business. Those who remained in the city came down here and then marched back again, and I believe we never took a vote during the whole time. If the Senator will act as a kind of Sergeant-at-Arms to keep here the Senators who will go away at any rate, then we might transact some of this important business; but I think the experience of Senators and of the Senate is that you cannot do it. If you could devise some way to keep Senators together, then it would be an argument against this usual adjournment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say one word in reply to that argument, because I have heard it before, and that is, that I cannot predicate an argument upon the presumption that the majority of this body have no regard for their official duties and will violate them anyhow.

Mr. WADE. I am opposed to this resolution. I do not believe that any session since I have been a member of the Senate has ever had so much important business thrust upon it at this period as this session has. There are a great many bills from the House, unfinished business of the last session, to dispose of, which will be as much and more than we shall be able to do if we pursue a very diligent course; and now it is proposed to adjourn over nearly two weeks and do nothing. I do not understand that we have been in the habit of making such adjournments. The adjournment at the last session was the first one I have known, where I believe we adjourned for about two weeks, and left the pressing business of the country to pursue our own amusements. I do not think we ought to do it. I should be very glad if I could by my vote accommodate gentlemen who wish to go away; but it seems to me the business of the country first demands our attention. I believe there is a great accumulation of business that we ought immediately to proceed with, and I think we are in danger of not getting half through with what we shall have to do. As to the next session, on the 4th of March, I do not know anything about that. It is so remote and so novel that I can predicate no action upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, since I have been a member of the Senate I am aware, as has been said by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that we have usually done little or no business during the holidays; but that the extent of our adjournments has been from Christmas until New Year's, or till the 2d day of January. Now it is proposed to extend this time—perhaps last year we did so—to adjourn on the 20th, and members want to know whether this resolution is to be adopted so that they can make their arrangements to leave at once. They are not willing to wait till the 20th arrives to have it determined, they desire to have it determined now; and I presume the result will be that there will be no quorum for a day or two before the 20th and for a day or two perhaps after the 3d of January. It is really throwing away almost a month of this short session—a session when we have got more important business, I think, than we ever had at any short session before.

In addition to the bill spoken of by the Senator from Maine, about which there has been such urgency, and which I reported from the Judiciary Committee some days ago—I allude to the bill to repeal that clause of the confiscation act conferring upon the President authority to grant pardons and issue proclamations of amnesty—in addition to that bill which I have tried to get up, and the Senate by a vote refused on one occasion to take up because other business was considered more important, and which I desired and intended to call up this morning, but a debate arose as to two other measures, and there was no opportunity to get it up—in addition to that, I say, we have a very important bill reported from the Judiciary Committee at the last session, and which was called up near the close of the session, entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," the object of which is to protect loyal men from prosecutions in their State courts—a bill of very great importance and very great urgency. The object of the bill is to afford parties an opportunity to transfer their suits to the Federal courts where they can be protected by the United States laws, and where the laws of the United States are respected and enforced, which I am sorry to say is not the case in some of the so-called State courts in the rebellious States.

Mr. HENDERSON. The civil rights bill provides for that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The civil rights bill did not provide for all these cases. This is a different class of cases. There are a great many other bills of the very highest importance, or thought to be so; and while I do not expect, as is said by the Senator from Ohio, that we shall be able to do very much business between the 24th or 25th of December and the 1st of January, for one week, I think that is no reason for throwing away another week also. I trust that this resolution will not be concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I have been in the habit for a good many years of listening to just such speeches as we have listened to from the patriotic and industrious Senators who have addressed the Senate, and for some six or seven years I was in the habit of following their advice and constantly voted every year against an adjournment. The result was, that in company with four or five members of this body, I was required to come up here every third day to adjourn the Senate over for three days at a time during the period that the rest of the gentlemen—I do not know that any of the Senators who have now addressed the Senate in favor of a continuous session were among the number—went home to their families. For the last two years I have voted for the adjournment, and voted for the long adjournment at the last session, as long as it is proposed to adjourn now, and I found that we were able to transact the business just as well during the session and accomplish just as much for the good of the country after that long adjournment as we had done when we were in the habit of adjourning only for three days at a time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was the long session.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes sir, long sessions and short sessions both. The Senator from Illinois says it has been stated that it is necessary that we should know now whether this resolution is going to pass or not, because gentlemen are unwilling to wait until the 20th shall arrive. That is a wholly gratuitous remark. I do not propose to go away; I never have gone; but I have colleagues and the Senator has colleagues who desire to go to their families. Heretofore, when we adjourned only for one week, from the 25th of December until the 1st of January, gentlemen who are Senators and Representatives from the States along on the sea-board had an opportunity to run home, but gentlemen from Illinois and Iowa, who are just as much attached to their families, and whose business it is just as necessary to look after as it is to look after the business of these gentlemen along the sea-board, had not any such opportunity, because it takes three days and nights to make the trip each way. It was for that reason, and to accommodate them as much as for any other purpose, that I am willing to extend this time. I think that all these gentlemen know, every one of us who has been here for the last six or seven years knows, we are not going to transact any business if we remain here, and there is no use of our making a pretense of virtue when we have not got it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I happen at this time to be one of the persons falling under the description in part made by the honorable Senator from Illinois; except that part of it which the Senator from Iowa has called gratuitous—and I agree with him—that I am now desirous to know what day we shall adjourn so that I may go at once. It happens that I have not been absent from the Senate a day, I believe, since I have had the honor of a seat in it, during its sessions, and that now there is a need that I should be absent for a little while, and I was rather desirous to know what day the Senate would adjourn, so as to make my arrangements accordingly, not wishing that my State should be unrepresented here. But I assure the honorable Senator from Illinois that I am as willing under ordinary circumstances to remain here, though not as useful while here, as he is.

Much has been said and much stress has been placed upon this matter of long adjournments during the holidays being of recent occurrence, or being instituted a year since. That is not so. Such adjournments have been made every year since I have been in the Senate, now the fourth year. Last year we adjourned on the 21st of December to meet on the 5th of January. This year it is proposed to adjourn on the 20th of December to meet on the 3d of January, not as long an adjournment as the adjournment of last year. There has been no difference between the adjournments made annually for the last four years; certainly no greater difference than that of a day or two.

Although I concede the great importance of the business stated so elaborately by Senators as being before the body, I doubt very much whether we shall not come to the transaction of that business with more directness by such an adjournment as is proposed than by sitting here. If the honorable Senator from Illinois were so situated this year as to have his family in Illinois, he would perhaps desire to go out there; but it may be, I do not know, that his family reside here at present. If so, there is a convenience in remaining here, and it is really inconvenient to be idle for two weeks, particularly with the habits of work of the honorable Senator. But I think we should invite and expect to enjoy his liberality toward us who happen to desire or absolutely need the absence. I hope, sir, that the resolution will pass, and I believe that the work of the country will not be the less performed therefore.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution:

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the House adjourn on Thursday the 20th instant, they adjourn to meet on Thursday the 3d day of January next.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps, if the honorable member from Iowa desires to adjourn the Senate over the holidays, it is necessary to amend that resolution; it only provides for the adjournment of the House. I suppose he wants the Senate to adjourn as well as the House; and if it is amended, as I presume it will be, the question is, whether it will be proper for us to adjourn. We can amend it, I suggest, if the honorable member is desirous that his friends should go home; but assuming that it is amended, or that as it stands it would order an adjournment of the Senate, I am not able, anxious as I am to oblige those who are anxious to get home, to vote for it. It is true that heretofore there has been some difficulty in keeping a quorum of the Senate and a quorum of the House together during the holidays in the absence of any adjournment; but as the compensation law is now different, possibly that difference may have some influence on such a result. As the law originally stood, whether the members were present or were not present, they received their per diem. As the law now is their per diem, if it can be called a per diem, their proportion of the salary which the law gives, which would be due them if they stayed here, cannot be paid, unless they certify that they are absent on account of sickness; so that every member of the Senate and of the House who leaves Congress while Congress is in session, as long as he stays away, has so much deducted out of his allowance. It is barely possible, looking to the expense of going away and the expense of returning, that that may have some little weight in keeping Senators and Representatives to what I understand the Senator from Iowa admits is their duty.

It seems to me to be rather singular for a gentleman who has such a high sense of political honor and moral duty to admit that it would be virtuous to remain; in other words, right to remain, and yet propose to go away. It is for himself and for others for whom he is laboring to judge whether it is a virtue that they assume without having it. He seems to admit that he would not be able to resist the temptation of going away in order that he might actually carry out the virtue of remaining here and discharging the public business.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to amend the resolution in the second line by inserting after the word "the" and before the word "House" the words "Senate and."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I, of course, shall vote against that amendment, because that is applying the rule which I supposed obtained with reference to the resolution as it stood before. I did not observe the peculiar phraseology of it. As it stands now, I understand it simply adjourns the House and leaves the Senate in session. The objection to that would be that it would be substantially obstructing business about as much if one House was absent and the other in session, as there could be no communication during all that time between the two Houses.

Mr. JOHNSON. Except the executive business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Except the executive business. That we might do. Therefore I should not vote for it in that shape or in any shape in which it can be put. I shall vote against the amendment and also against the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am rather opposed to this amendment. There seems to be a greater necessity for the Senate to remain in session than the House. They have a peculiar way of doing business in the other House that is certainly expeditious. They meet at nights, with the understanding that no vote shall be taken, and give every member an opportunity to talk himself out. They do not restrict debate, but they do not compel people who do not wish to listen to speeches, to listen; but in this body we must listen to all the speeches that anybody sees fit to inflict upon us. We have spent the whole of this week in passing a bill which the House passed in half an hour. They put on the previous question, passed the bill promptly, and sent it back to us the very day that it was sent to them.

Now, sir, I think the Senate ought to remain here and do their talking. Let every man who wants to make a speech make his speech with the understanding that all the talking shall be done during the holidays, and that on the 3d of January this body shall meet to do business. The talking having been done, we shall then be ready for voting.

I hope the amendment will not prevail, but that this body will remain, and let every man who wants to talk talk to his heart's content; and on the 3rd of January the other House will appear ready to transact business, and we, having done our talking, will be ready to transact business, and then we can go on and do the business of the country satisfactorily.

I hope the amendment will not prevail, but that the Senate will remain in session and every member will have an opportunity to discuss everything. We have no rules to limit debate, and it is very important that these speeches should be made, and I hope we shall remain in session for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the resolution, offered by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

* The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the resolution as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Creswell, Davis, Doollittle, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Dixon, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Cowan, O'ragin, Edmunds, Fowler, Guthrie, McDougall, Nesmith, and Nyce—9.

So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. BROWN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can only be received by unanimous consent, another subject being properly before the Senate, on which the Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I give way to that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the reception of the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire now to submit, for the purpose of having it printed, an amendment which I shall propose at the proper time to the bill for the admission of Nebraska.

The amendment was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor on the Nebraska bill. Does he yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not object to that. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 14, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GOVERNMENTAL LINE OF TELEGRAPH.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the purchase or construction of a military and postal line of telegraph under the direction of the Post Office Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LOYAL GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to present to the House a memorial addressed to the two Houses of Congress, signed by Hon. J. M. Wells, Governor of Louisiana; Hon. W. B. Hyman, Chief Justice; Hon. R. K. Howell, Associate Justice; Hon. J. K. Belden, late Associate Justice; Hon. J. W. Handlin, Judge; Hon. H. C. Warmoth, Judge; Hon. Jacob Hawkins, late District Judge, and about one thousand others, electors of Louisiana, praying that Congress may take immediate action for the organization of a new and loyal State government in Louisiana, and for the protection of the loyal people of the State.

I move that the memorial be printed, and referred to the select committee upon the New Orleans riots.

Mr. BINGHAM. Should not this memorial be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this document does not relate to reconstruction in Congress.

The memorial was referred to the select committee on the New Orleans riots, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES K. DEAN.

On motion of Mr. COBB, leave was granted to Charles K. Dean to withdraw his papers from the files of the House.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have a subject which I should like to have permission to introduce and have referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and as it is a matter of some interest I should like to have it read. It is somewhat of an experiment, but one which I think will benefit the country. It is a bill for the construction of a Government telegraph from Washington to New York city.

The bill was read.

The first section authorizes and directs the Postmaster General to construct a telegraph line from the city of Washington to the city of New York, which line is declared to be a mail route, subject to all existing laws in relation to mail routes in the United States, so far as the same may be applicable; and it provides further that the Postmaster General shall have power and authority to establish the necessary offices for the use of said line, and shall have authority and power to procure all necessary rooms for offices, and to procure a sufficient number of agents and operators to operate said line of telegraph.

Section two provides that no message shall be sent over the said line unless it shall be stamped with a three-cent postage stamp, and there shall be a uniform rate for the transmission of messages, without regard to distance, of one half a cent for each word, except for the odd word of any message there shall be no charge; but no message shall be sent for a less sum than ten cents; and there shall be charged two cents for the delivery of each and every message, provided that the Government shall be entitled to send and receive all its messages over said line free of charge, and shall have priority in sending all messages.

Section three appropriates the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

There was no objection; and the bill was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN CANAL.

Mr. WELKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Canal Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill providing civil governments for districts lately in revolt against the United States, and for the restoration of said districts to their forfeited rights as States of the Union; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill fixing the time when pensions to widows and orphan children of persons in the military and naval service reported as missing in action and not subsequently accounted for during the late rebellion shall commence.

ARMY.

Mr. HAWKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DELANO called for the regular order of business, which the Speaker stated to be the call of committees for reports of private bills.

MISS SUE MURPHEY.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported back Senate bill No. 413, for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which motion was agreed to.

OBER, NANSON AND COMPANY.

Mr. DELANO, from the same committee, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 173, for the relief of Ober, Nanson & Co., merchants, of New York, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution in the preamble recites that Ober, Nanson & Co., of the city of New York, did, on October 18, 1865, deposit in the post office of the city of New York a sealed package, containing twelve hundred compound-interest notes of the United States, each of the denomination of fifty dollars, dated September 1, 1865, and falling due September 1, 1868, amounting to $60,000, which notes are described as follows: $5,000, letter D, Nos. 272,801 to 272,900 inclusive; $5,000, letter A, Nos. 276,201 to 276,300 inclusive; $5,000, letter C, Nos. 270,801 to 270,900 inclusive; $5,000, letter A, Nos. 268,601 to 268,700 inclusive; $5,000, letter C, Nos. 268,601 to 268,700 inclusive; $5,000, letter C, Nos. 268,301 to 268,400 inclusive; $5,000, letter C, Nos. 275,501 to 275,600 inclusive; $5,000, letter D, Nos. 270,501 to 270,600 inclusive; $5,000, letter C, Nos. 275,301 to 275,400 inclusive; $5,000, letter D, Nos. 276,201 to 276,300 inclusive; $5,000, letter A, Nos. 275,601 to 275,700 inclusive; $5,000, letter A, Nos. 275,901 to 276,000 inclusive. Which package was directed to Ober, Atwater & Co., merchants of the city of New Orleans, and was registered and receipt given by the postmaster at New York, dated October 18, 1865, and was dispatched through the United States mail, on the steamship Republic, to its place of destination, as certified by the postmaster of New York; and that said steamship Republic, with the United States mails thereon containing said sealed package, was sunk and lost in the sea on the 25th of October, 1865, at a point about one hundred and forty miles east of Savannah, Georgia, and no part of the mail on board was saved or recovered; and then the joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said Ober, Nanson & Co., or their assigns or legal representatives, the amount of said notes supposed to be lost as aforesaid, with the interest thereon to the time of their maturity, at any time within six months after the maturity thereof; provided, that there shall not appear before such payment evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury that said notes have not been lost and destroyed; provided, further, that the Secretary of the Treasury may require of said Ober, Nanson & Co., their assigns or legal representatives, to execute and deliver such bond of indemnity with adequate sureties as he may deem necessary before such payment is made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to have my friend make some explanation in regard to the matter. I think it comes within the principle uniformly objected to.

Mr. DELANO. Ober, Nanson & Co. are merchants under that firm name in New York, and under the firm of Ober, Atwater & Co. in New Orleans. In October, 1865, the New York firm transmitted by mail to the New Orleans firm $60,000 in seven-thirty notes. A list of them was made by numbers and marks, and they were placed in the Post Office. A receipt was given for them and they were put on board of a vessel carrying the mail between New York and New Orleans. That vessel was lost at sea. The mail was lost and no part of it has ever been recovered. Proof of all these facts is clear and irrefragible. There is no doubt about it. The committee have been very careful in examining the matter.

Mr. THAYER. Was there any insurance?

Mr. DELANO. No, sir; there was a mistake made as to the name of the vessel which carried the mail, and so the insurance failed. These notes, as I have said, all mature in the year 1868. The resolution that we have offered for the relief of these parties is simply an expression of the legislative department of the Government of the right of the Secretary of the Treasury, not, I want it understood, to duplicate this evidence of indebtedness, but to pay for these lost notes six months after their maturity and not before, and then only upon taking such security as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, if any.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller are both of opinion that they have now by law authority to pay the indebtedness of the Government, and to pay these notes after maturity, provided they can be proven, as they have been here, to be lost. But the reason for this bill is this: this house is not one of very large means, and stripping it of this amount of its capital is a great embarrassment to it. Relying upon the naked authority of the officers of the Government to pay them when the notes become due, the house is unable to raise any means upon the credit of these papers. Now, all that is proposed by this joint resolution is simply that these notes may be paid six months after their maturity. It is supposed that this distinct authority will furnish some relief to these sufferers in the way of obtaining credit ad interim.

I have thus stated frankly and fully to the House the facts in the case and the reason for the introduction of this joint resolution. I will move to amend it by striking out the word "may" in line eleven and inserting "shall," so that it will read, "that the Secretary of the Treasury shall require of said Ober, Nanson & Co., their assigns or legal representatives, to execute and deliver such bond of indemnity," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is with great diffidence that I suggest any opposition to any matter that goes through an investigation by my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.] I know his great care and diligence in these matters, but I must confess that I am not clear as to the adoption of the principle involved in this joint resolution. It seems to me it involves this: that the Government becomes liable to and must pay every dollar of money that shall be lost through the mail—every five or one dollar greenback—if the parties come here and make evidence that it is lost.

Now, I can never forget a matter which came before us very much like the present one, when it was alleged that certain bonds—I think they were Oregon war bonds—were lost on board a mail steamship from San Francisco. Evidence was taken, and it was shown most conclusively to the House that a large amount of these bonds were utterly destroyed. I resisted the passage of that bill, but the House saw fit to pass it. The bill passed the Senate and became a law, but a few days afterward the Secretary of the Treasury wrote to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means asking him to have that law immediately repealed, those very bonds, whose loss had been proved by evidence piled mountain high, having been presented to the Treasury for redemption.

Now, we cannot legislate too cautiously in regard to all these matters, and I think if we undertake to adopt this principle we shall wade very deeply into the Treasury, and I do not know where we shall land. The insurance companies are open to all of these men, and they could have got this money insured if they saw fit.

But it may be said that the Government is not protected even in that respect, for I am told by the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and it must have been when I was not present, for I do not recollect it—that the House went to the extraordinary length of passing a bill of insurance. It seems to me that we are very far at sea, and I do not know where we shall land. I submit the matter to the House whether they are prepared to adopt this principle at the present time.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I have very much respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois upon this subject and all kindred subjects, but I would like to suggest to him, for his consideration, that we are making a different rule as between the Government and individuals than that which obtains between individuals themselves. It is the rule of law in all the States that when the possessor of a note can prove the loss of a note he can recover the amount of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that so as to bank notes, that banks pay for such losses? Never.

Mr. SPALDING. I am inclined to think that a bank would be compelled to pay for the loss, if the loss of the bank notes could be proved satisfactorily. I have no doubt upon that subject as a lawyer. If these notes have been actually lost, the Government loses nothing by paying this amount to these unfortunate persons who have sustained this loss. I would go with my friend from Illinois in demanding the greatest amount of testimony to assure us that the loss has been bona fide incurred. So far I would go, but not further.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Would it not be well to let the case go to the Court of Claims?

Mr. SPALDING. I have no particular objection to that.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to call the attention of the House to one or two items which have not been noticed in this discussion. So far as this bill is concerned it only sets forth that this package has been lost and that the postmaster gave a receipt for the package. These men allege that there was $60,000 in compound-interest notes in the package. Now, the House will remember very distinctly the case to which attention has been called by the gentleman from Illinois where it was certified conclusively, by all the evidence necessary, and by some that was almost unnecessary, that certain bonds had gone down beyond hope of recovery in the Golden Gate, and the House passed a bill to reimburse the owners of those bonds, when it subsequently turned out that the bonds had not so gone down in the Golden Gate. I wish the House to pay particular attention to this fact; these notes are legal tender in the hands of the holders, they may be in the hands of fifty or a hundred parties, and when they are presented at the Treasury for payment they must be paid.

Now, I suggest to gentlemen that we will have established a precedent, if we pass this bill, by which we will open a door against which I know of no safeguard that can be raised. Every man throughout all this country, for the present and the future, as long as it remains the law of the land, can sue and recover against the Government for every greenback, every legal-tender note placed in the mail, every five or ten dollar bill sent by mail to any part of the country, if it shall be lost during the transmission; and all that the party will be required to establish will be that on a certain day he placed a package in the hands of a postmaster, taking his receipt therefor, in which package he alleges he placed a legal-tender or other note of the Government. If the Government is bound to pay $60,000, with the accrued interest thereon, upon such evidence as is presented in this case, then it must pay for every five or ten dollar note under like circumstances. I hope the House will consider well before it passes such a law as this.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, this is rather a peculiar case. I know very well the gentlemen who have sustained this loss. And in reference to this case, I am informed that these are the facts: these gentlemen proposed to send by mail this large amount of money, and took the precaution to go to the post office in New York city for the purpose of ascertaining the vessel by which the Government proposed to send that day the mail to New Orleans. These parties then deposited the package containing this money in the post office, taking the receipt of the postmaster therefor, and then obtained an insurance upon it by the vessel named to them. Had the Government sent the mail by that vessel then these parties would have had recourse upon the insurance company. But after giving this information to the parties owning this money, the Government post office authorities in New York sent the mail by another vessel. These parties had no information of the change; they had no idea that there was to be such a change. After they had paid the insurance upon the vessel by which they were informed the mail was to be sent the authorities sent it by another vessel, and that vessel was lost. Now these men have no recourse upon anybody, chiefly through the wrong information imparted to them by the post office authorities in New York.

Their only recourse is to come here to Congress for relief. The vessel by which this money was sent is lost, and lost with everything on board of it. The mail sent on board of that vessel is lost, being sent by that vessel without notification to these parties, after they had been informed that the mail in which they had placed this money would be sent by another vessel. Now, I know these gentlemen very well; they are high-minded, honorable merchants.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (in his seat.) That has nothing to do with the principle involved in this case.

Mr. HOGAN. These parties would not present an erroneous or unfounded claim here. They did everything in their power to ascertain the vessel by which the mail would be sent, and obtained an insurance upon the money in that vessel. As the money was sent by another vessel the insurers were entirely relieved from responsibility in consequence of the change. I hope, as this question has undergone a very thorough examination by the Committee of Claims, that this House will sustain the recommendation of that committee.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. While I agree that the House should exercise great care in passing bills of this character, yet I believe some definite rule ought to be established upon which the House will act. Now, obligations issued by the Government are not the debt itself, but, like the obligations of private individuals, only the evidence of indebtedness. The destruction of the evidences of the indebtedness does not obliterate the debt itself. And it is a well-known principle of law that if the obligation of a private individual is lost an action can be commenced upon the indebtedness as though the obligation had not been lost; and upon sufficient proof of its loss, and indemnity and security given, the person who held the evidence of indebtedness can recover the debt. It seems to me that the same rule ought to be applied in respect to the loss of obligations or evidences of indebtedness on the part of the Government.

Mr. PRICE. I would like to ask the gentlemen from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] a question.

Mr. SLOAN. Very well.

Mr. PRICE. The question I desire to ask is this: will the courts give judgment for a claim for a negotiable paper not yet due? That is one question. Another is: will this Government pay for a twenty or fifty dollar greenback if there is one eighth or one quarter of it torn off?

Mr. SLOAN. The court will not give judgment until the obligation is due. Nor do we propose to pay these obligations before they shall have become due. This bill simply provides for the reissue of the obligation and for its payment after it shall have become due.

In this case the parties who allege that these notes were lost come before the Committee of Claims and present such evidence as would establish in any court of justice the loss of the notes. After they have done this they are entitled to be paid when the notes become due, provided they will comply with the condition corresponding with that upon which in every State, so far as I know, the courts compel the payment of lost obligations; in other words, by giving security that if the obligations should be presented for payment the Government shall not be the loser by paying them.

Now, conceding that the proof before the Committee of Claims is such as would establish before any court of justice the loss of these obligations, these claimants, on giving the proper security, are entitled, in my judgment, upon well-settled principles of law administered in the courts of every State, to have this relief; not to have payment before the obligations are due, as the gentleman from Iowa suggests, but to have payment after the obligations are due.

This bill provides that six months shall elapse before payment is made, and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall take ample security before he makes any payment whatever. Under a bill thus guarded it seems to me the national Treasury is in no danger of suffering detriment, and that the parties should be indemnified for the loss of these evidences of debt.

Mr. DELANO (having obtained the floor) said: I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I have not risen to make a speech on this question, but only to call the attention of my respected colleague [Mr. SLOAN] and other members of the House to a precedent which was set in the Thirty-Eighth Congress on a bill somewhat similar to this. It was a claim presented to the House by the distinguished gentleman from the fourth district of Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] for the relief of a widow, the mother of a soldier of the Union army, who with his earnings had purchased one of the smaller bonds issued by the Government, which bond was destroyed through an accident, a pure accident, happening at the time of the invasion of Maryland by the rebels. That bill was for the purpose of indemnifying that needy lady by the issue of a new bond. There was no earthly doubt on the mind of a single member of this House that the bond had been destroyed by an accident, without any fault or laches on the part of this poor widow; nevertheless, that House, composed in great part of the members now present, decided by a very large majority against allowing the relief asked; and if my recollection is not entirely at fault my colleague, [Mr. SLOAN,] who has just addressed the House, voted with me and with the majority against the allowance of that claim.

We voted against and defeated that claim not because we did not believe it just that that poor widow should be paid, but because we considered that the passage of such a bill would set a dangerous precedent, of which crafty men, the getters up of false and fraudulent claims against the Government, of which, in short, the "lobby" would not be slow to take advantage, to the serious loss and detriment of the tax-payers of the country. I think, sir, that no member who at that time voted against the claim of that poor widow can vote for this claim to pay gentlemen whom I suppose to be bankers, large moneyed men. Certainly not without self-stultification can I vote for the payment of any such claim.

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. DELANO. I do so with pleasure.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know what objection can possibly exist to referring this, which seems to be a very important question, to the Court of Claims. If that motion will be in order I will move that the bill be so referred. It seems to me that of all claims that can come before this body this is peculiarly one of that class which should be investigated judicially. So far as I can learn from the discussion here—and there seems to be no report accompanying the bill—this package may or may not have contained money according to the correctness of the statements of the parties who are the claimants before this House. So far as appears, it is their own assertion that they put in the post office a package which they say contained a certain amount of money or a certain number of bonds. I desire to know from the gentleman from Ohio whether I am correct in that statement.

Mr. DELANO. No, sir; the gentleman is not correct.

Mr. HILL. I shall be glad to be set right if I am in error.

Mr. DELANO. I will detain the House a few moments in order that I may at least enable members to understand this question properly. I appreciate the cautious regard to the interests of the Treasury which brings gentlemen to their feet in opposition to this bill. I am glad to observe this determination to prevent the Government from being improperly and unfairly dealt with in reference to this subject, for it is an important one.

First, then, in reference to referring this claim to the Court of Claims: the joint resolution does not propose any payment until these notes mature and until six months after they mature. The Secretary of the Treasury has the authority by general law to pay the debts of the Government, and where those evidences of indebtedness are lost and destroyed, and the proof is satisfactory and the debt is matured, he can pay it without any legislation. Referring this to the Court of Claims would be doing entirely a nugatory act. The Court of Claims can do nothing on the subject to relieve anybody.

Now, the simple question is whether it is advisable for this House to pass this specific authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay these notes six months after they are due, and whether there are reasons in the case sufficient to justify the specific authority. But before I come to that question I desire to ask the reading of the evidence in the case.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The following is an analysis of the evidence:
James W. Cole, notary public, 54 Wall street, New York, certifies, under his official seal, that on the 18th of October, 1865, he placed in a parcel, sealed with his official seal, $60,000 in fifty-dollar United States compound-interest notes, all dated September 1, 1865, which was directed to 'Ober, Atwater & Co., New Orleans, Louisiana.' This certificate describes the notes by letters and numbers corresponding with the description in the petition. The petitioner's affidavit, sworn to before T. E. Stillman, notary public, New York city, asserts that he is a member of the commercial firm of Ober, Nanson & Co., of New York, and of Ober, Atwater & Co., New Orleans; that on the 18th day of October, 1865, the New York desired to remit to the New Orleans house $60,000, to pay for cotton purchased there; that he drew from the National Bank of the Republic in New York city $60,000 in compound-interest notes of the United States, each dated September 1, 1865, and each note of the denomination of fifty dollars and of the numbers designated in the certificate of James W. Hale, notary public; that he caused said notes to be placed in a parcel by said notary public, sealed with his official seal, which was then directed to Ober, Atwater & Co., New Orleans, and was by him delivered at and deposited in the New York post office to be carried in the United States mails to New Orleans; that the said parcel was duly registered at the post office; that the said mail containing said letter was dispatched by the steamer Republic, which was lost at sea October 25, 1865. The receipt attached to his affidavit is the original receipt of the New York postmaster for said letter, and that the certificate thereto attached is the certificate of said postmaster as to the registry of said letter, the dispatch of the mail containing said letter, and the loss and non-delivery thereof.

"The receipt referred to in the foregoing affidavit is as follows:

"No. 1889.—Registered letter.

"POST OFFICE,

"NEW YORK, October 18, 1865.

"Received of Ober, Nanson & Co., a letter addressed to Ober, Atwater & Co., New Orleans, Louisiana. (To which is printed the name of) JAMES KELLEY, Postmaster."

"The certificate referred to in Mr. Ober's affidavit is dated at the post office, New York, January 11, 1866, signed by James Kelley, postmaster, and certifies that a letter directed to Ober, Atwater & Co., New Orleans, Louisiana, was received at this office October 18, 1865, from Messrs. Ober, Nanson & Co., was registered and dispatched in the mail forwarded the same day, per steamer Republic, which was lost at sea, no part of the mail, so far as he knew, ever having been recovered.

Affidavits of E. Young, master and commander of the steamship Republic; of Sarsfield E. Young, chief officer or mate, and of William H. O. Moorhouse, purser of the same, taken before notaries public, establish the following facts: that said vessel sailed from New York for New Orleans on the 19th of October, 1865, having on board the United States mails; that on the 24th of October, 1865, during a severe gale of wind, the vessel sprang a leak, which continued to gain upon her until about four o'clock p. m. of the day following, when she went down at a point about one hundred and forty miles east of Savannah, Georgia, and nothing was saved on board the ship except the lives of the passengers, who were taken off in the vessel's boats and upon a raft made for that purpose; that the mails remained on board the vessel locked up between decks against the bulkhead of the ladies' cabin, and at the time the vessel went down were lost with their contents in the sea."

"The affidavits of Walter Kelley and James Young, of the city of New York, and clerks in the post office having charge of registered letters, establish clearly that said package directed to Ober, Atwater & Co. was placed in the mail-bag for New Orleans, which was delivered on board the steamer Republic."

"The committee are of opinion that the evidence leaves no reasonable doubt in regard to the destruction of the notes described in the petition. As the securities supposed to be destroyed are in the nature of bank notes, having been issued for circulation, the committee unanimously agree that it would be unwise and unsafe to order duplicates to be issued, no matter how clear and conclusive the evidence of destruction may be."

Mr. DELANO. I want the House to understand, whatever disposition they may make of this case, these were compound-interest notes; that they mature in 1868, and that we do not propose to duplicate them, for I have refused, and so has the committee, to duplicate any of that class of our securities. But we propose to give specific authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay these notes six months after their maturity, if no future evidence is shown that they exist, upon the ground that they have been lost or destroyed. The Secretary of the Treasury might pay them, as I have said before, after they mature on sufficient proof of loss or destruction without this authority.

And that brings me to the point made in a private inquiry by the gentleman from Illinois; which I propose to answer to the House.

Mr. PRICE. That was the question I was about to ask, whether there is a regulation of the Treasury by which these notes would be paid in a certain time after maturity.

Mr. DELANO. No, sir.

Mr. PRICE. Such things have been done without legislation on the subject.

Mr. DELANO. Now, let me say on the very threshold of this case, I presented it to the Secretary of the Treasury, that he expressed the strongest desire for the relief of these men, but was unwilling to set the fearful example of duplicating these notes. He said he preferred the course I have taken, this specific authority to allow him to pay it, not because of this necessity, but for the reasons I will state hereafter.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Suppose the notes shall be found hereafter.

Mr. DELANO. It provides six months shall expire before they are paid; and the Secretary of the Treasury may require of Ober, Nanson & Co., their assigns or legal representatives, to execute and deliver such bond of indemnity, with adequate sureties, as he may deem necessary before such payment is made.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman who has the joint resolution in charge, what necessity there is for the passage of this measure at this time? These notes do not fall due till September, 1868, and this joint resolution provides they shall not be paid till six months after that, which will make it two years and three months from this time. If the owners of this claim are not fearful these notes may turn up, or some evidence which will prevent the passage of this joint resolution in the future, what is the necessity of pressing it now? Certainly the reason intimated by the gentleman from Ohio, that these parties want this in order to negotiate or borrow money is not sufficient, if they are men of the character set forth by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HOGAN.]

Mr. DELANO. I think I brought the minds of those gentlemen who have given me their attention to the legitimate question. We avoid the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], that this makes the Government responsible for notes sent by mail, and bring ourselves down to this very question, that the Government may pay its indebtedness for notes that are lost and destroyed. It is asked: why shall this specific authority be given in this case? I want the House thoroughly to understand this matter.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I would like to know whether the affidavits that we have heard read may be considered as having been made in court or before the committee under such circumstances that the parties would be liable to be prosecuted for perjury in case it should turn out that their testimony was corruptly false?

Mr. DELANO. These affidavits have all been taken before persons authorized to administer oaths in the city of New York. The claim was brought and represented to me by Hiram Barney, of New York, a gentleman whom I have known for a long time and on whose character I felt that I had some right to rely. I went with him to the Secretary of the Treasury, and under the advice and at the desire of the latter I introduced this joint resolution. But that is of no consequence except to let the House understand why I act. Mr. Barney represented this firm, and the facts in the case convince me that it is true, as being highly honorable, but not very strong. Here is $60,000 taken out of their business, and it is to them a very serious embarrassment, as every business man can understand.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask whether Mr. Barney in this transaction was the attorney of the parties?

Mr. DELANO. That I do not know. I do not know whether he was acting with a fee or without it; but I know so much of Hiram Barney, that it would make no difference to him whether he was or not. The loss to the business of these men is a serious embarrassment. They wanted duplicates of these notes and they were willing to agree to take notes payable ten years hence with interest if duplicates could be given. But we were unwilling to duplicate them.

This resolution does not increase the legal liability of the Government to pay these notes; provided the destruction is clearly proven. We propose by this resolution that the Government shall pay them six months after maturity, taking proper security, so that when this becomes a law these men will have in the money market the evidence upon which loans can be obtained.

I have thus endeavored to state the case clearly and fairly to the House. It has been only after very full investigation, and with the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, that I have brought it before the House. It is a relief against a great casualty, which we can afford to give without setting any precedent that will be dangerous hereafter.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Before the gentleman sits down I wish to suggest that this is not a present claim against the Government. The parties expect about two years hence to have a claim, but until the two years expire there is no claim accruing.

Mr. DELANO. Each gentleman can state the question to suit himself. The fact is the notes have been lost, the proof is clear, the money has been taken out of the business of the firm, and the Government will not issue duplicates. These men are therefore deprived of the evidence of the indebtedness of the Government to this large amount, and if we pass this bill we shall say to them in the form of an enactment that six months after the maturity of these notes, if they give the proper security, the amount shall be paid.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the House must understand this question, and if no one desires to discuss it any further I will move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say one word, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DELANO. Very well; I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What I wish to say is in regard to the testimony in this case, for I think it is a matter to be closely watched as to the sufficiency of the testimony. I will state that the testimony in this case does not begin to be half as strong as the testimony in the case to which I referred some time since, where the bonds subsequently came to light. There is only a certificate here.

Mr. DELANO. The affidavits are sworn to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It states that Mr. Cole, a notary public, certifies so-and-so. I do not see anywhere that Mr. Cole has made any oath whatever as to these matters. According to the face of the report, which the gentleman has made the only evidence whatever upon which this claim is based, is the ex parte affidavit of the parties in interest, and that is the affidavit of the petitioner, sworn to before Mr. Stillman, that he drew the money, and so forth. That is the only evidence that appears here in regard to this money. The certificate of the registered letter which is set out here is merely the ordinary and formal certificate which is made by every postmaster where a letter is registered. There is no evidence here of any disinterested parties that they saw these compound-interest notes in the letter. I submit to my friend from Ohio if upon a reëxamination of the question he really thinks the evidence set out here is sufficient for us to act upon. It seems to me extraordinary that any business man should deposit the sum of $60,000 in compound-interest notes in a registered letter to New Orleans, when there are express companies everywhere. That seems to me rather strange on the whole. I do not doubt that these gentlemen are very honorable and trustworthy men, but that does not alter the principle. We must act on the testimony. The testimony must go upon the record, so that if we establish this precedent it may be seen upon what we acted.

Mr. HILL. I have prepared a joint resolution for the purpose of referring this case to the Court of Claims. The report of the committee has been read, and it appears from that, as the gentleman from Illinois has stated, that there is the ex parte affidavit of the claimant himself, and that that is the only affidavit before the House.

Now, as has been already stated, there are two years yet before any claim for the payment of these notes can be made, and I think that in the mean time the Court of Claims can investigate the matter. There are certainly some very peculiar circumstances attending this case. It is remarkable that with so many express companies in the country, good business men should deposit $60,000 in a registered letter. Owing to these peculiarities in the case I wish to submit a joint resolution referring the claim to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. DELANO. I can see no good that is to be accomplished by referring the case to the Court of Claims. I would rather that the bill should be defeated than referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. My colleague [Mr. CORN] has referred to a vote that I gave in the Thirty-Eighth Congress as an inconsistency if I vote now for this bill. I desire simply to say that my colleague is mistaken and that I did not vote for the bill to which he refers.

Mr. DELANO. I will not detain the House any longer, even to reply to my friend from Illinois. I say to the House again that the evidence is as clear in this case as human testimony can make it that these notes were put into a package, which was put into the post office and into the United States mail, and that the vessel containing that mail went down at sea within one hundred and fifty miles of the coast.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] if the witnesses who made proof of the facts here set forth were subjected to a personal examination by the Committee of Claims?

Mr. DELANO. They were not. The character of the men who brought this claim, the character which they bear at the Treasury Department, where they had been before, did not seem to us to require it.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Does the gentleman know of the existence of the notary and other persons named in these papers except from the papers themselves?

Mr. DELANO. And from public rumor; that is all.

Mr. DEMING. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] allow me to inquire when this claim originated?

Mr. DELANO. In the fall of 1865. These notes were mailed on the 18th of October, 1865.

Mr. DEMING. During the disturbed relations of the mail service at New Orleans, when the Union army first went there—

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire if the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has just expired.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I move to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. DEMING. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. At the expiration of the morning hour, any member can move to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table, even though another member may be upon the floor addressing the House. The Chair will have the rule read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is an invariable practice, too, to permit a member upon the expiration of the morning hour to take the floor, even though another may be occupying it, to make the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table."

Mr. DELANO. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] will permit me to call the previous question upon the passage of this joint resolution and have it disposed of now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If it shall not interfere at all with my right to make the motion I have indicated I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can reserve his right to make the motion after the pending subject shall have been disposed of.

Mr. DELANO. I should be glad, with the consent of the House, to permit the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] to make some remarks on this bill before I call the previous question. If that is objected to I will call the previous question at once.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] will be entitled to the floor to close the debate after the main question has been ordered. The gentleman can then yield a portion of his time to any member.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am willing to yield to have the previous question called; but I must object to any farther debate.

Mr. DEMING. I did desire to make some remarks, but I will waive them.

Mr. DELANO. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was read a third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. DELANO. I call the previous question upon the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 67, not voting 48; as follows:

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The first business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2 strike out lines fifteen and sixteen, as follows:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next and last amendment of the Senate was read as follows:

On page 2 strike out lines eighteen to twenty-two, inclusive, as follows:

For salaries of ten supervising and fifty-nine local inspectors, appointed under the act of August 30, 1862, for the better protection of the lives of passengers by steamboat, with traveling and other expenses incurred by them, $7,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I will only state in reference to this amendment, that on looking over the bill there appears to be some doubt whether we have not twice included this item. Therefore the Committee on Appropriations have concluded to acquiesce in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON CIGARS.

The SPEAKER. The next business on the Speaker's table is a joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and lying upon the Speaker's table at the close of last session. It is entitled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 189) declaring the meaning of a certain provision of the internal revenue act relating to cigars.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that such part of the internal revenue act as refers to the tax or duty on cigars shall be so construed that the ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. shall be levied only on the excess of value above twelve dollars per thousand.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I ought to say a single word on this subject. When we passed the internal revenue act in this House the tax on cigars was fixed, I believe, at four dollars per thousand upon all cigars below twelve dollars per thousand, and on those of higher value the rate was to be, in addition to four dollars, twenty per cent. upon the excess over twelve dollars. That bill, after consideration in the Senate, went to a committee of conference; and when before the House, on the report of that committee, I asked the gentleman who made the report whether the provision in reference to cigars had been changed. He told me explicitly that it had not been. The bill was not read at all at that time, and hence there was no opportunity to discover the mistake. It turns out now that by the phraseology of the act as passed, the additional tax on cigars valued at over twelve dollars per thousand is fixed at twenty per cent. upon the whole value, instead of twenty per cent. upon the excess over twelve dollars. Hence on cigars valued at thirteen or fourteen dollars per thousand the tax is so large that it is better for the manufacturer to sell them at twelve dollars. The object of this bill is to correct the mistake, as it undoubtedly was, and fix the tax at twenty per cent. on the excess over twelve dollars per thousand, as originally intended.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose that this bill shall be acted on now?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the gentleman the propriety of referring it to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee expect at a very early day to report a bill in which this subject will be appropriately embraced. A matter of this kind affecting the revenue of the Government should not be hastily acted upon, but should receive examination at the hands of a suitable committee. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and on that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. MORRILL. I will do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will not be referred. It is designed to correct one of those manifest instances of injustice which, it seems to me, need only to be mentioned to be corrected.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated the circumstances of the passage of the act which embraced the error designed to be corrected by this bill. The act, as passed by the House, levied a tax of four dollars per thousand upon all cigars valued at prices ranging from eight to twelve dollars per thousand; and on all cigars valued at more than twelve dollars there was to be imposed on the excess an additional tax of forty per cent. ad valorem.

When the bill was brought back from the committee of conference it was found they had reduced the forty per cent. ad valorem tax to twenty per cent. No one objected to that because it did not disturb the principle of a gradual increase; but instead of putting the twenty per cent. upon the excess over twelve dollars, they put the twenty per cent. upon the whole twelve dollars which had already paid four dollars and upon the excess in addition, that is upon the whole value of the cigars.

How does it operate, and why has there been so much complaint? On the twelve-dollar cigar you pay a four-dollar tax. On the thirteen-dollar cigar you pay not four and twenty, that is four dollars and the addition of twenty per cent. ad valorem, making $4 20, but you pay $6 60; leaping from $4 40 to $6 60 at once, for the twenty per cent. ad valorem is charged upon the whole value. How does it operate in practice? The man who manufactures a twelve-dollar cigar and pays a four-dollar tax has eight dollars left for himself; but if he makes a thirteen-dollar cigar he has to pay $6 60 and has but $6 40 left for himself. It is better, therefore, for him to make the twelve-dollar cigar.

And so it goes on. The fourteen-dollar cigar instead of paying $4 40 as we intended, putting on the twenty per cent. in addition to the $4 40, pays $6 80. The fifteen-dollar cigar pays $7 instead of $4 60. By jumping from $4 up to $6 60 and making that addition to be paid by adding twenty per cent. ad valorem, not upon the excess above twelve, but on the whole value of the cigar, you actually leave a man who makes the thirteen-dollar cigar but $6 40 after paying the Government tax while the man who makes the twelve-dollar cigar gets $8 after paying the Government tax.

I say it is clear from this, why over the whole country those connected with this cigar interest are complaining, and justly complaining; but as it went through as I must conceive by some sort of blunder, certainly by a misunderstanding so far as the gentlemen connected with this interest, arising out of an explanation to us by a member of the committee, I think the least we can do is to correct it and not suffer this interest to be longer oppressed as it now is. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me. I will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. With pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. The House will remember at the last session we had great difficulty on this cigar question. The Senate was opposed to any ad valorem duty whatever, and in the committee of conference they insisted we should put an absolute duty and not an ad valorem duty. Finally, as a matter of compromise, in the committee of conference it was agreed on the cheap cigar there should be a tax of two dollars, and upon cigars valued over eight dollars there should be a tax of four dollars, and upon cigars above twelve dollars a thousand, those not known as cheap cigars, there should be a tax of four dollars, and an ad valorem tax of twenty per cent. on the whole value. I am at a loss to see what interest is injured. These cigar manufacturers who produce more valuable cigars are compelled to pay a higher tax than they would if they only paid a tax upon the excess over twelve dollars per thousand. If there is any one to be injured it is the Government, because it is a scheme to reduce the tax on manufactured cigars in this country. I do not think we are prepared now to reduce taxation on these cigars. I think the House ought to refer this subject to the Committee of Ways and Means so we may consider it carefully.

If the principle contended for by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Pennsylvania be correct we should increase the tax and make it forty per cent. above twelve dollars instead of twenty per cent. This is upon high price cigars actually no tax at all. I hope the whole question will be referred to the committee so that we may investigate it fully. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SAFETY OF STEAMBOAT TRAVEL.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 147, amending the ninth section of the act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852; which, on motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 1, to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the previous question on the bill.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield for the purpose of moving to amend the bill by adopting an educational test? I would like to take the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot yield for that purpose.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after the passage of this act each and every male person, excepting paupers and persons under guardianship, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has not been convicted of any infamous crime or offense, and excepting persons who may have voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebels in the late rebellion, and who was born in the United States or naturalized, and who shall have resided in the said District for the period of twelve months next preceding to any election therein, shall be entitled to the elective franchise, and shall be deemed an elector and entitled to vote at any election in said District, without any distinction on account of color or race.

The second section provides that any person whose duty it shall be to receive votes at any election within the District of Columbia, who shall willfully refuse to receive, or who shall willfully reject, the vote of any person entitled to such right under this act shall be liable to an action of tort by the person injured, and shall be liable on indictment and conviction, if such act was done knowingly, to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year in the jail of said District, or to both.

The third section provides that if any person or persons shall willfully interrupt or disturb any such elector in the exercise of such franchise he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not to exceed $1,000 and be imprisoned in the jail in said District for a period not to exceed thirty days, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Section four makes it the duty of the several courts having criminal jurisdiction in said District to give this act in special charge to the grand jury at the commencement of each term of the court next preceding the holding of any general or city election.

Section five provides that the mayors and aldermen of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, respectively, on or before the 1st day of March in each year, shall prepare a list of the persons they judge to be qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said mayors and aldermen shall be in open session to receive evidence of the qualification of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said list, and on two days in each year, not exceeding five days prior to the annual election for the choice of city officers, giving previous notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper printed in said District.

Section six provides that on or before the 1st day of March the mayors and aldermen of said cities shall post up a list of voters thus prepared in one or more public places in said cities, respectively, at least ten days prior to said annual election.

The seventh section provides that the officers presiding at any election shall keep and use the check-list herein required at the polls during the election of all officers, and no vote shall be received unless delivered by the voter in person, and not until the presiding officer has had opportunity to be satisfied of his identity, and shall find his name on the list, and mark it, and ascertain that his vote is single; and any person who shall attempt to influence votes by purchase or bribe of any kind shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, and any person accepting such bribe shall be punished by imprisonment not less than one year, and be perpetually disfranchised.

The last section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. NIBLACK and Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 46, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos B. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Dawes, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and the Speaker—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chandler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hise, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hunter, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, McKee, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Andrew H. Ward, and Whaley—46.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banks, Boaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bronwell, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dumont, Parquhar, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Lynch, McClurg, McCullough, Morrill, Myers, Plants, Radford, John H. Rice, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Henry D. Washburn, Winfield, and Wright—28.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BINGHAM said: My colleague, Mr. PLANTS, is detained at his house by illness.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to make an inquiry. Several members are absent attending to duties on special committees. Will they be entitled to record their votes when they return?

The SPEAKER. They will not except by suspension of the rules, which can only be done on Monday.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will then state that my colleague, Mr. MYERS, is absent on the special committee on revenue frauds, and that if he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. GRINNELL. My colleague, Mr. HUBBARD, is detained from the House by illness. If he were here he would vote for the bill.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from New York, Mr. DARLING, is absent on a committee of investigation.

Mr. FERRY. My colleague, Mr. BEAMAN, is absent on a special committee. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. INGERSOLL. My colleague, Mr. COOK, is not present. If he were here he would vote in the affirmative.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON CIGARS.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill in relation to the duty on cigars was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My colleague from the Chicago district [Mr. WENTWORTH] desires to make a speech to-day, and with a view of giving him an opportunity of doing so, I will move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message. Before, however, that motion is put—I do not like to make the motion myself, because I am opposed to adjournments—I will yield to some gentleman to make a motion to adjourn over.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that leave of absence be granted to my colleague, Mr. MORRIS, for this week.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message; upon which Mr. WENTWORTH was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States makes it the duty of the President from time to time to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. In his first message after the commencement of this Congress he dwelt upon the fact that there were certain States not represented as the most important information that he could give us, and he recommended as the most expedient and necessary of all measures that we give them immediate representation. He informed us of only what we and all our constituents knew before; and he admitted in that message that each House was the judge of the qualification of its own members. Having done what he conjectured to have been his duty, one would have supposed that he might there have rested, knowing that Senators and Representatives had their responsibilities as well as himself. Instead of this he has been lecturing us upon the subject ever since. [Laughter.] Scarcely a communication did he address to either House of Congress at the last session in which he did not repeat, and in almost the same words, the sentiments of his first message. Not content with this, as early as the 22d of February last, he commenced addressing promiscuous out-door assemblages and dictating newspaper articles and telegraphic dispatches denouncing Senators and Representatives even by name for their fidelity to the principles upon which they were elected; and lest the people should not understand his views he did what no President ever did before, made a tour of the States in which elections were pending and repeated his old story about States lately in rebellion.

I understand that the expenses of this Presidential trip are to be, if they have not already been, paid out of the public Treasury. I shall hold our Committee on Appropriations responsible for keeping all items for that trip out of their report. [Renewed laughter.] If they are to come before us at all let them come in a separate bill and stand upon their own merits. I shall do my best to defeat any appropriation bill, however meritorious, that provides for their payment. [Cries of "That is right."]

It is not the fault of the President if the people did not understand him when they recently uttered their wholesale condemnation at the polls. The present acting President has been not inappropriately compared to the other acting Presidents. I have been a member of Congress under the administration of them all. A doctor once said he could not cure all diseases "unless by some medicine they could be changed into fits; he was good on fits." [Laughter.] Now, while I would not venture to make many predictions about the conduct of the mass of mankind, I can predict exactly how a man will conduct if changed from a Vice President to an acting President. I am as good upon acting Presidents as the doctor was upon fits. [Renewed laughter.] They have all been, now are, and hence it is safe to say, ever will be, traitors to the party that elected them; and the people are sick of them. They, however, sustained Tyler in his second Congress; and they did the same by Fillmore. Both these gentlemen were able to carry their administration measures in the second Congress of their terms.

And the present Executive had an advantage in the universal sympathy which the public had for the soldiers. Profiting by the boast of a former southern President, when told that he could not carry a certain obnoxious measure through Congress, "that the South was with him upon principle and he would soon make the North so on patronage," no sooner had he made up his mind to assassinate the Union party, as Booth had done its acknowledged head, than he caused it to be proclaimed throughout the country that he intended to give all his patronage to soldiers. And he has appointed a few soldiers where they would pretend to be for his policy. For I view the support of the policy of this Administration by the mass of soldiers holding offices as mere pretense, justified perhaps under the idea of foraging upon the enemy. [Great laughter.] In my own city, one of Mr. Lincoln's intimate personal friends was removed from the office of postmaster and a crippled soldier appointed his successor. He was confirmed by the Senate, and he sent to the Department his bond properly approved. In the mean while, it was hinted that he had better go to the Philadelphia convention. This was too much for him. He could face rebel bayonets, shot, and shell, but a Johnson convention frightened him. [Loud and continued laughter.] And so another man was appointed in his place. With all this pretended love of the soldiers, however, the popular elections could not be carried for the Administration. Impersonated bread and butter, speak if I misrepresent you. [Shouts of laughter.]

After the policy of the Executive has been almost unanimously condemned, after it is apparent that he will have a smaller number of supporters in the next Congress than any other Executive ever did have, he sends to Congress another message. And what does it contain? It begins and ends with a mere repetition of his former messages and popular harangues. Out of twenty pages he has ten for traitors; and ten for all other subjects embracing, according to his own showing, important financial exigencies and delicate foreign relations. The late Senator Collamer, when a member of this House, once told a story of a clergyman who had been in the habit of preaching the same sermon upon great occasions for several years. On one occasion he asked an auditor how he liked the sermon. The reply was, "I always did like that sermon." [Laughter.] Go among the disloyal people who have always been rejoicing over the messages of the present President and ask them how they liked the late message, and the reply would everywhere be that they always did like that message. [Renewed laughter.]

I read a newspaper account recently of an aged college president who was reading to his students a chapter in the Bible daily with the intention of reading the Bible through in course. Some roguish student daily placed back his mark until he had read the same chapter daily for a long time. [Great laughter.] Perhaps some one has been playing a similar prank with our President. We certainly are getting the same message all the time, and I wish for variety's sake that some one would change the mark. [Long and loud laughter.]

The President keeps telling us that he has done all that he could do to complete the restoration of the Union, and that all has been done that is necessary to be done except to admit representatives from the late rebel States. And then he kindly adds that the remainder belongs to Congress, and that each House is the judge of the qualifications of its own members. Now, if he feels that he has done his own duty, why cannot he be quiet and leave us to do ours? The Constitution defines his duties, and he professes to have discharged them. The same Constitution defines the duties of Congress, and its members profess to have discharged them. The people have reviewed the acts of Congress and indorsed them. Its members cannot change their policy without proving as false to the expressed will of the people as he has to the principles upon which he was elected to office. And when men are sustained by their own convictions and by overwhelming majorities of the people, how vainly can any one hope to change them! He has tried denunciation; he has tried patronage; what more can he do?

I see it stated in some of his organs that the Administration is about to remove all the female clerks, mostly the widows and children of our soldiers and nurses in our hospitals. This cannot be to punish Congress, [laughter,] for had he supposed that radical Congressmen had relatives or friends among them he would have removed them long ago. [Renewed laughter.] It must be to import disloyal voters into the District in anticipation of the effects of the universal suffrage bill, which we have this day enacted into a law. If he cannot carry a State he wants to keep this District. [Great laughter.]

Here I must digress to express my wonder at how Omnipotence turns the intended evil of men into real good. When I first came to Congress colored men were carried through the city in shackles and sold at public auction. From the windows of the Capitol a horrid slave-pen could be seen, and children would be shrieking around it trying to get one more gaze at their agonizing parents sold for the southern market. But the rebellion came with all its horrors; the President was assassinated; the Vice President was debauched; yet from it all came not only the black man's enfranchisement, but his equality in everything that constitutes citizenship.

The President well knows that the conqueror is always entitled to indemnity for the past and security for the future. Now, this Congress, in a spirit of compromise, offers to take either of these two things. But we cannot get the indemnity, according to his own showing in his messages detailing the destitution of the southern people, so we must insist upon the security; and that security is contained in the constitutional amendment. It would have been given long ago, and all the old States would have been represented in this Congress had Mr. Lincoln lived, or had the present Executive pursued his policy. For there was a time when the States lately and still in rebellion would have complied with any executive exaction. But instead of asking the disloyalists to favor the constitutional amendment, he has done everything in his power to make them oppose it. And hence he is responsible for keeping them unrepresented.

His course reminds me of the celebrated fable of Æsop, entitled "The Wolf and the Lamb," and running somewhat in this way: A wolf and a lamb happened to come at the same time to drink at a stream that ran down a rocky mountain. The wolf stood upon the higher ground and the lamb at some distance below him. The wolf made the stream so muddy that neither could drink and then charged it upon the lamb, abused him, and finally tore him to pieces. The President is the wolf and Congress is the lamb.

Mr. STEVENS, (in his seat.) That is so. [Laughter.]

Mr. WENTWORTH. He is doing all he can to keep the rebellious States out of Congress, and then he charges it upon us. He is muddying the political waters and censuring us for his own acts. The "White-House" wolf may growl, however, but he cannot devour. [Laughter.] He even vetoed a bill conferring upon southern men their civil rights. When this Congress assembled at its first session there were two classes of men destitute of civil rights. One never had any, and the other once had them but forfeited them. Congress at once relieved them both over the President's veto, and has ever since been anxious to adopt any measure that would tend to their common benefit, showing in its brotherly love no difference between the loyal black and the disloyal white man.

The President dwells upon the injustice of taxing a people without representation. How much worse is the condition of the people in the disloyal States than the condition of the people of this District who never had representation and yet have always been taxed? How much stronger claims have they to representation than the people of Nebraska and Colorado, whom he is keeping out of the Union when they have more white population than some of the disloyal States? Idaho, Montana, and each of the Territories are allowed no votes in Congress, and yet they are taxed. Florida has not the white population of several of our Territories whose people pay more taxes than she does, yet the President would give her a Representative and two Senators. I voted to admit her once to representation upon the same terms with the other States; I am willing to do it again when I find her as I then did, qualified. The President complains that Tennessee was not admitted to representation until after the eighth month of the session. Here applies the fable of the wolf and the lamb again. [Laughter.] It was the President who kept her out. When she complied with the terms of Congress, when she clothed herself in the habiliments of loyalty, when she gave security for the future by the adoption of the constitutional amendments, she was at once admitted to representation. Her erring sisters can be admitted upon the same terms. The road to representation in Congress is a straight one, but rather narrow for traitors. [Renewed laughter.] If they put on their wedding garments they can come to the feast; otherwise they must remain in their present outer darkness where they are weeping, wailing, and gnashing their teeth. [Laughter.] And I am willing, when the constitutional amendment shall have been adopted, to give universal amnesty for universal suffrage, but not before.

The President dwells upon the efficacy of the test oath in keeping traitors out of Congress. I have but very little confidence in it. The fact that so many traitors have been elected to both the House and Senate, with their own consent, over Union men is proof that they all mean to take the oath. Every man who went into the rebellion after taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States perjured himself; and why should he hesitate to perjure himself again? I know it is contended that they believed that the Constitution of the United States justified secession. Who knows but they will renew their oath under the same construction? The case of the Tennessee Senator should be a warning to us when the potency of the test oath is quoted. The Senator-elect, a son-in-law of the President, having a delicacy about taking the oath, the Senate in its extreme weakness, [immense laughter,] modified the oath for his benefit. This House by a strict party vote refused to concur. The Senator then took the oath notwithstanding his prior delicacy. So I fear will it be in cases still stronger than his. They will try to have the test oath modified or repealed, and their northern allies will aid them. But, failing in this, they will swallow the oath like an oyster. [Great laughter.] Besides, I believe the President is in favor of repealing the oath. I know his supporters are.

But we are asked what is to become of these States lately in rebellion if they do not secure their representation by the adoption of the constitutional amendment? As well might we ask what is to become of the people of this District or any of the Territories if they do not secure their representation? Without going into details, I will define my own position in general terms by quoting another fable which seems adapted expressly to the present condition of things.

A traveler was one day accosted by a snake from under a rock, asking to be let out. The traveler at first was afraid of the consequences, and told the snake that he was afraid he would bite him if he was let out. The snake asserted that he had been under the rock a long time, that he regretted his natural propensities, and was resolved hereafter to effectually control them. After much parleying the traveler compassionately removed the rock, and he and the snake traveled along some distance agreeably together. Finally, the snake said that he felt like biting somebody; that he might not bite the traveler, but that his venomous propensities had returned with such strength that he could not much longer control himself. [Laughter.] He contended that the promise he had made was made under duress; that God had made him for a snake, that he had no other functions to perform than those of a snake. The traveler entreated him to control himself and reminded him of his original promise. The matter was finally compromised by agreeing to leave the question in dispute between them to the first three animals they should meet. The first was the wolf. He decided that the snake was restored to his original rights, and that his promise made while under duress was not binding. The next animal met was the lamb, who decided in favor of the traveler, and was in favor of peace among all animals. The third animal met was the fox. Before he could give his opinion he wanted to survey the original premises. Upon reaching them he asked the snake to lay down in exactly the position he was in when the traveler found him. He then asked the traveler to place the rock as it originally was. This being done, he said: "This case requires great deliberation, and we must take time to consider it."

And so he and the traveler passed on. [Great laughter in the House and galleries.]

Upon all questions growing out of the rebellion, it is evident that the President will be impotent for the remainder of his term; and he may as well reserve his vetoes for legislation upon other subjects where they will be needed and where they can be sustained. He has in his message called our attention to the necessity of "carrying into every department of the Government a system of rigid accountability, thorough retrenchment, and wise economy." I call his attention to the same subject, [laughter,] and I shall be happy to cooperate with him in that respect. I fear that his language upon the subject of economy will be as meaningless as that concerning making treason odious. It certainly proved so at the last session. But he will have an opportunity to redeem himself in this respect at the present session. A few weeks will determine whether the proverb applies to him of "Falsus in uno, in omnibus falsus." [Great laughter.] For never were the signs so ominous of a powerful combination to increase the public debt and postpone its payment, to continue the suspension of specie payments, to donate money to questionable railroad companies who already have large grants of land, and to make extravagant appropriations to questionable objects. This country is in more danger to-day from extravagance and corruption than it ever was from the rebellion. In fact, more Governments have been overthrown by corruption than by arms. A distinguished historian says that all republics have fallen by their own corruption. Will not Andrew Johnson stretch out his arm in time to save ours?

The President indorses the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. In that report I find the following:

"After the proper and necessary reductions shall have been made, the revenues will doubtless be sufficient, if the Government shall be economically administered, to pay the current expenses, the interest on the public debt, and reduce the principal at the rate of from four to five millions per month. In order that this may be done, however, there must be no additional donations to railroads, no payments but in the fulfillment of contracts, and no unnecessary expenditures of money for any purpose whatever."

Now, if the President wishes to redeem himself and to make treason to the best financial interests of the country odious, let him use his veto in instances where he is sure of the support of at least one third of this House.

I reserve any remarks upon the financial necessities of the country for a more appropriate occasion. But while referring to the recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury, let me call attention to the fifth remedy he proposes for the financial embarrassment of the country, namely: "The rehabilitation of the southern States." I have read with the same respect that I always entertain for his opinions what he says upon this subject; and I can find nothing there that does not apply with equal force to the District of Columbia, to Nebraska, to Colorado, or to any of our Territories, all of which are taxed but have no votes in Congress. If, however, it will be of any service to the Secretary in making his financial calculations, he can take it for granted that Congress has done all it intends doing with reference to "the rehabilitation" of the States recently in insurrection. It has done all that it dare do with reference to unmistakable public opinion. From his relation to the President, he can do more toward their "rehabilitation" than Congress can. Let him use his influence for what he says he considers a desirable financial object. Let him persuade the rebel States to adopt the constitutional amendment. Let him tell them that the feast is now ready, that the doors of Congress are now open, and that it is only necessary for them to put on their wedding garments to come in and enjoy liberty, equality, and fraternity on earth, as it is in Heaven.

Mr. HISE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose by any means to become the eulogist of the President, or to indulge in any hyperbolic eulogy of the present President of the United States, either before or since he became President. I would, however, say that upon a close observation of the course of the President since he has become such, I believe that he has been governed by high and patriotic motives, and further than that, I believe that his communications to Congress and the doctrines and policy which he has recommended in his messages indicate that degree of moderation and wisdom which is peculiarly adapted to the present crisis and the circumstances now surrounding the country.

But, sir, my main object is not to praise the President. I do not intend to be committed in any manner to any party that acknowledges him as its leader. I confine the expression of my approbation only to the course which he has pursued since, owing to the lamented death of his predecessor, he has become President of the United States.

My main object, sir, in seeking the floor in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where alone we have an opportunity for discussion, has been for the purpose of discussing the subjects presented in the first portion of the President's message, to wit, the right of the States that were in insurrection, ten in number, to be represented in the House of Representatives of the United States, and to have their two Senators on the floor of the United States Senate. I propose to discuss the right of those States to be represented in both branches of the American Congress. That is one subject that I wish to consider. Another subject is the questions that arise under the public policy indicated by the bill intended to restrict the appointing and removing power of the President of the United States. Another bill, I believe, has been reported to the House in regard to the system of excise or internal taxes and the patronage that arises under that system; to confer that patronage in substance upon an independent department of the Government; to take the appointment of the officers provided for by the bill, some of whom have large salaries, from the executive department, and to confer it upon the Chief Justice with the consent of the associate judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. I want to have a full opportunity to oppose that bill in Committee of the Whole, inasmuch as I find that it is exceedingly difficult for any one on this side of the House to get the floor to discuss any of these bills when they are up for consideration and action in the House.

I wish also to have the opportunity in Committee of the Whole to consider and discuss another bill, to wit, the bill which proposes to deprive the States lately in rebellion of the right to vote for President and Vice-President until they shall be permitted by the law-making power of this Government to be represented in Congress.

These are the matters I propose to discuss. But inasmuch as the House has already listened to one speech to-day in Committee of the Whole, and inasmuch as it will be impossible for me to go fully into the discussion this afternoon, I will ask the indulgence of the Committee to rise, so that I may have possession of the floor when the House shall again resume the consideration of the President's message. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. KELLEY. I would suggest that there may be some other gentleman here who is ready to go on at this time. He might address the committee now with the understanding that when we again go into the Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hise] shall be entitled to the floor. I do not desire to show any discourtesy to that gentleman.

Mr. HISE. Rather than that course should be pursued, I will proceed now, although I would prefer to make my remarks some other time. But an old man like myself gets exhausted after these lengthy sessions, especially toward the dinner hour.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have a suggestion to make which will probably remove the difficulty. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hise] will yield to some other gentleman who may be ready to address the committee this afternoon, at the close of that gentleman's remarks he can again obtain the floor, and address the committee when the House shall next resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLEY. My suggestion was the same as that made by my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL.] I did not intend or desire to show any discourtesy to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Hise.] If there be nobody else who desires to occupy the floor this afternoon, of course I will not oppose the motion that the committee now rise.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. Hise, that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the President's annual message had come to no resolution thereon.

NEW ORLEANS RIOTS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I ask to be excused from further service upon the select committee appointed to investigate the riots at New Orleans. I ask it upon the ground that my State has but recently been permitted representation upon this floor, and the business of my constituency has accumulated to such an extent during the past five or six years that it needs my personal attention in Washington. No objection was made.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. HIRAM McCulloch, of Maryland, to fill the vacancy.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I reserve the right to make points of order on this bill when it shall come up for consideration.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the special order for Tuesday next after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of. The motion was agreed to.

COLONEL L. F. FIX.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that Colonel L. F. Fix have leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers in his case, upon the usual condition that he leave copies of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

HALE AND RUST, COVINGTON, KENTUCKY.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made an adverse report upon the petition of Hale & Rust, Covington, Kentucky, asking extension of the time in which to pay tax upon manufactured tobacco; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ADJUSTMENT OF POSTMASTERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the adjustment of the accounts of postmasters under the act of July 27, 1854; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ALLOWANCE OF EXTRA RATIONS.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to place all officers of the Army on the same footing therein as to allowances of extra rations for volunteer service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

T. P. DEVEREAUX, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, made an adverse report from the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs upon the petition of T. P. Devereaux, Halifax, North Carolina, for relief on account of slaves set free by the proclamation of emancipation; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the pension laws so as to provide that in all cases where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that any soldier of the Army of the United States, during the rebellion, died in any rebel prison it shall for all purposes of pensions in such cases be deemed prima facie that such soldier died of disease contracted in the service of the United States in the line of his duty.

LIEUTENANT JOSEPH P. FYFFE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs a joint resolution for the restoration of Lieutenant Joseph P. Fyffe, of the United States Navy, to the active list from the reserved list.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object.

DORANCE ATWATER.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee on the case of Dorence Atwater, appointed pursuant to resolution of this House of last session, be continued for the present session with the same powers.

AMENDMENT OF MILITARY LAWS.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing section twenty-five of an act approved July 28, 1866, to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL TENNESSEANS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a resolution passed by the House on the 18th day of January, 1866, in the substance following: "That until otherwise ordered, the Committee of Claims be instructed to reject all claims referred to them for examination by citizens of any of the States lately in rebellion, growing out of the destruction or appropriation of, or damages to, property by the Army or Navy, while engaged in suppressing the rebellion;" be and the same is so modified as not to embrace any claims presented by loyal citizens of Tennessee.

Mr. THAYER and Mr. WARD, of New York, objected.

Mr. DELANO. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rules, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio: The petition of Bar Behymer, asking pay for military service rendered the Government in 1864.

By Mr. DENNY: The petition of Captain J. Thomas Turner, for travel pay from Baltimore to San Francisco.

By Mr. GRISWOLD: The petition of Jacob Sharon and Albert C. Corse, for compensation for machine for post-marking of letters, &c.

By Mr. PIKE: The petition of Robert T. Osgood for extension of letters-patent.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of A. S. Dyckman, and 74 others, citizens of South Haven, Van Buren county, Michigan, praying Congress for an appropriation of $50,000 to complete their harbor at South Haven, at the mouth of South Black river.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 17, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, information in relation to the appointment of commissioners provided for in the twenty-fourth section of an act to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, approved March 3, 1863," approved February 24, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a communication from the acting Comptroller of the Currency, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, information in relation to banking associations which have failed to comply with the provisions of law requiring a reserve of money on hand; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I have received from Norfolk the proceedings of a grand mass meeting of the unconditional Union men without regard to color, held at the First Baptist church, December 11, 1866, and signed by the president, vice president, and secretaries of the meeting. I have been requested to present these proceedings to the Senate. They are in the nature of a petition, as one of the resolutions expressly declares that the proceedings are to be submitted to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America. In these carefully prepared resolutions there is a solemn protest against what are called the countless insults, persecutions, and tyrannical punishments of themselves and their loyal friends and neighbors; and they further say that they most positively refuse to recognize any civil government as now existing within the insurrectionary territory of Virginia. They further say:

"That we earnestly pray that Congress ignore the so-called State government of which Francis H. Pickens is the ostensible head, but which is ruled by rebels, and establish in its stead a loyal territorial government with some staunch and firm friend of the Union as territorial governor. Hon. John C. Underwood, now judge of the United States court, we would recommend to your especial consideration."

They further say:

"That if Congress will assume the exercise of their right to regulate the establishment of free government in the South these territories will assume a healthful and vigorous support of a republican form of government."

There are some reasons for a reference of these proceedings, with the accompanying memorial, to the Committee on Territories, as the signers ask that the State of Virginia should be treated as a Territory and provided with a proper Governor and other officers; but as I understand that the committee known as the reconstruction committee is still in existence I shall ask the reference of this paper to that committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object to the reception of that paper. It is, as I understand, the proceedings of a public meeting held in Norfolk, Virginia. Since I have been a member of this body I have known the proceedings of public meetings not to be received by the Senate of the United States because they were not in the character of a memorial addressed to the Senate of the United States. I make the point that, under the rules of the Senate, the proceedings of that meeting cannot be received, the paper not being a petition or a memorial addressed to the Senate of the United States but simply the proceedings of a public meeting. The President will recollect, I have no doubt, that on several occasions the proceedings of public meetings have been presented to the body and been refused to be received by the body on the ground I have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the reception of the paper, the Chair will put the question to the Senate: Shall the document offered by the Senator from Massachusetts be received?

Mr. SUMNER. On that I will make one word of explanation. I think the Senator from Delaware did not understand precisely my statement with regard to the paper. I am well aware of the rule to which the Senator has called attention. Had these been simply the proceedings of a public meeting I should not have ventured to present them. It was because on examining the document carefully it appeared to be in the nature of a petition to Congress—the concluding words of the resolutions adopted are especially addressed to Congress and are in the nature of a petition—it was on that account, after careful consideration of the document, that I felt it to be my duty to present it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the document offered by the Senator from Massachusetts be received?

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document is received, and will be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction if there be no objection.

Mr. WADE. I present the memorial of J. W. Phelps, representing that he has been for many years an owner of real estate in the city and county of Alexandria, which city and county, though rightly belonging to the District of Columbia, have been transferred to the State of Virginia. He goes on to set forth that the people there have but little confidence in the courts of justice of that State, and that there are other very strong reasons inducing them to desire to get back to the District. Believing that the act of retrocession was unconstitutional, he prays that that act may be annulled and that part of the District reinstated. As there is a bill on that subject before the Senate, I move that this memorial lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I present also a petition, numerously signed, from citizens of the United States—I do not know what part—who pray Congress—

"1. To propose for ratification by the several States an amendment of the Constitution substantially as follows:

"ARTICLE —. No inequality among citizens on account of birth, race, color, previous inequality, or previous non-residence, beyond the preceding year, shall be made or recognized by the laws of the United States, or by the constitution, laws, or municipal regulations of any part thereof. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"2. To remove, by immediate legislation, any such inequality from the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the ten unrestored States, and to take all necessary measures for peace, order, justice, and the security of life, liberty, and property in the same."

I move the reference of this petition to the committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Major General Winfield S. Hancock and other officers of the Army of the United States, praying for the restoration of the law which allowed fifty cents instead of thirty cents as the commutation price for rations; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POLAND. I present a petition signed by R. G. W. Logan and a large number of other persons, all of whom represent that they have served in the Army of the United States in the late rebellion, and that all of them have been sufferers by the loss of property taken for the use of the Army of the United States, praying for the passage of some law providing a means of compensating them. Similar petitions were before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate during the last session, and a bill was reported upon that subject, which is now pending. For the present I move that this petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY presented the memorial of

B. A. Froiseth, of St. Paul, Minnesota, praying for the adoption of a system by law to encourage foreign immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of Hackenburgh & Co., Reynolds & Fisher, and a large number of ribbon manufacturers, silk throwsters, dyers, dealers, and others interested, praying for such a change in the tariff law as will impose a specific duty on thrown silk and silk cloths of every description, or so much increase the present rate of ad valorem duty as shall bear some comparison with the higher cost of labor, and that will maintain in some degree the respectability ardently sought for by the American artisan; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of seamen, firemen, coal-passers, and marines who served in the defense of the Union during the rebellion, praying for a bounty of $100 a year or eight and one third dollars a month while in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the memorial of John A. Ragan, a native of Georgia, who says that he has discovered a plan to prevent the inundations of the Mississippi river, which consists in making canals of different kinds in different portions of the country connected with the river, and he asks that the United States will cause a reconnaissance to be made and appropriate money for that purpose, and to assist also in making the canals. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 205) for the erection of a statue to the memory of Brevel Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 192) relative to certain flags captured during the late war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 67) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, and the bill (S. No. 323) to fix the military peace establishment of the United States, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that the bills be indefinitely postponed, the subject-matter of them having been acted upon heretofore in other forms; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 218) for the relief of John H. Ellis, a paymaster in the United States Army, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 346) for the relief of Hugh Leddy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mary M. Taylor, praying that certain lands in the island of St. Helena, parish of St. Helena, South Carolina, may be delivered to her upon the payment of the taxes due the United States, reported a bill (S. No. 478) for the relief of Mary M. Taylor; which was read and passed to a second reading.

VOLUNTEER ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 83) respecting the publication of the Volunteer Army Register, to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have that resolution read. I have no objection to its being acted upon; but I should like to have it read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be canceled the volumes of the Roster of Volunteers already printed, and that the Roster compiled as directed by the joint resolution approved March 2, 1865, be published in accordance with the plan submitted by the Superintendent of Public Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what is the present condition of that publication, if it is so far advanced that it will be useless to pass this resolution; for I think the publication is enormously expensive, and entirely useless on account of being full of inaccuracies. I am told that there is not one page in five but what has been canceled after it has been stereotyped. If it is so far advanced that the money is nearly all expended, perhaps it would be useless to pass the resolution; but I believe whenever you stop the publication, all the money that would be required to finish it will be saved. All that has been spent upon it has been utterly wasted. I thought that this resolution passed at the last session.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that after the resolution was introduced a statement was made to the committee by officers in the Adjutant General's Department, who had the care of it, that they had made great progress in the work, and the expense of the publication would be much less than was supposed; that there were errors in the first volume, but they thought they could have a correct one for the future. I have not examined how the other volumes compare with the first one. Certainly the first volume was full of errors on nearly every page. If the Senator desires it, however, I am willing to let this resolution lie over, and I will make inquiries into the exact state of the publication.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would prefer to have it lie over. That first volume, which purports to contain a roster of the early regiments, does not have in it the regiment that marched from the Senator's own State, and drew the first blood in Baltimore; it does not have the regiment that General Burnside commanded, and which my colleague led into the first Bull Run; and of all the names I have looked for fully one third were not there. I think it is not only a great waste of public money but a shameful insult to the officers whose names are left out to publish such a book and call it a roster. I thought the publication was stopped at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the consideration of the resolution and report at this time, it will lie over under the rule.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw my motion. Let it go on the Calendar.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on Claims. It is impossible for me to attend to the duties of that committee and also the duties of the other committees with which I am connected. I therefore ask to be discharged from further service on that committee, and that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on excusing the Senator from further service on the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator further moves that the vacancy in the committee be filled by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 474) to authorize and require amendments and to cure defects in proceedings in the courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 477) to amend an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May 17, 1848; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 475) to prevent and punish false and fraudulent representations to induce emigration to a foreign country; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the reference on that bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and in making that motion I desire to make a brief statement. I have some important papers going to show that certain persons have arrived from foreign countries with the expectation of treating the free colored people of the United States very much as coolies have been treated in other countries. They hope to obtain a cargo (if I may so express myself) of free colored persons as coolies. Entering into some species of contract with them they hope, under that form, to get the control of them and virtually to reduce them to a new form of bondage in a foreign country. It is on that account that I have asked the reference of the bill I introduce to the Committee on Foreign Relations; but at the same time I desire to warn the colored people of the country, so far as I can from my place in this Chamber, to be on their guard against any such efforts. From papers now in my hand I feel confident that there are persons here desirous of treating them as coolies. Let them be on their guard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, no objection being interposed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the question of reference is disposed of, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to one point. It seems to me that anything which makes an act a crime, or imposes a new penalty for a crime to be treated by statute, ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. They are familiar with those questions and those statutes. All such questions have always gone to the Committee on the Judiciary; for instance, the question of the kidnapping of colored persons and taking them abroad went to the Committee on the Judiciary, and from that committee a bill was reported and we enacted it into a law.

Mr. SUMNER. I can at another moment, if I have an opportunity of seeing my friend alone, explain to him what he will recognize as a sufficient reason for this reference. In moving this reference I believe I have followed the precedents of the Senate. All the bills with reference to the slave trade and its abolition have been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk:

Mr. President, the House of Representatives has reconsidered its vote agreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 876) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, and it has directed me to return the bill to the Senate in compliance with its request.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the Secretary cause the error in the engrossment of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 876) this day returned by the House of Representatives to the Senate to be corrected, and that he return the said bill and amendments to the House and request its concurrence in the said amendments.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 1) to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia; which was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. ROBERT JOHNSON, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed on the 15th instant the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 308) confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, and State of Wisconsin; and

A bill (S. No. 373) releasing to Francis S. Lyon the interest of the United States in certain lands.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish, for the information of the Senate, copies of the reports of the assistant commissioners of the Freedmen's Bureau, together with a synopsis of the local laws respecting persons of color as they now exist in the late slave States.

BILLS REFERRED.

On the motion of Mr. PATTERSON, the bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon, and the bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry, heretofore introduced by him, were taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RUSSIA AND AMERICA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I communicate a translation of a letter of the 17th of August last, addressed to me by His Majesty Alexander, Emperor of Russia, in reply to the joint resolution of Congress, approved on the 16th of May, 1866, relative to the attempted assassination of the emperor, a certified copy of which was, in compliance with the request of Congress, forwarded to His Majesty by the hands of Gustavus V. Fox, late Assistant Secretary of the Navy of the United States.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, 14th December, 1866.

[Translation.]

His Majesty the Emperor of Russia to the President of the United States of America:

PETERHOF, 17th August, 1866.

I have received from the hands of Mr. Fox the resolution of the Congress of the United States of America on the occasion of the providential grace of which I have been the object.

That mark of sympathy has moved me sensibly. It is not alone personal; it attests once more the sentiments that bind the American nation to that of Russia.

The two peoples have no injuries to remember, but only good relations. Under all circumstances new proofs of mutual benevolence are added.

These cordial relations are as conducive to their reciprocal interests as to the good of civilization and humanity, and answer the designs of divine Providence, whose will is peace and concord among all nations.

It gives me a lively pleasure to see these ties constantly strengthened more and more. I have imparted my sentiments to Mr. Fox. I pray you to be my interpreter to Congress and the American people whom it represents. Tell them how much I appreciate, and with me the whole of Russia, the testimonies of friendship they have given me, and how happy I will be to see the American nation grow in strength and prosperity by the union and constant practice of the civic virtues that distinguish it.

Accept, at the same time, the assurance of the high consideration with which I am your good friend.

ALEXANDER.

The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R.

No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the Senator will not call up that bill at this time. The bill for the admission of Nebraska as a State was before the Senate at its last session, and I was submitting to the Senate some remarks on that bill at the time of the adjournment on Friday. When the bill which the Senator from Illinois calls up comes up I shall desire also to submit some suggestions on that bill. I do not wish to discuss both at the same time. I would rather the Senate would proceed with the Nebraska bill if it is going to be considered to-day at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we may get through with this bill before one o'clock; we have twenty minutes yet before that hour. I trust the Senate will proceed to its consideration at any rate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I appeal to the Senator not to call up that bill this morning. The other bill was expected to be completed to-day. Some of us would wish to say something on the bill that he calls up. If gentlemen desire to discuss that bill only until one o'clock, and then take up the Nebraska bill, I do not object to that, but I do not think there will be any advance in the consideration of the bill by taking it up at this time. It can hardly pass in twenty minutes, I should think.

The motion was agreed to; and House bill No. 828 was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to have the thirteenth section of the act of 1862 which it is proposed to repeal read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to hear the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee state what particular reasons there are for passing this proposed bill. It does nothing but repeal, as I understand it, one of the sections of the act of 1862 which gave the President authority in certain cases to grant pardons either general or special. I do not know whether I am right or not, but I have been under the impression that that power is now in the Executive by the Constitution; that it is not conferred by the act of 1862; and that nothing will be accomplished by its repeal. I suppose that the proposition to repeal the act was founded on the opinion that without it the power could not be exercised by the Executive. I should like to know whether that is the opinion of the honorable chairman; whether he proposes to repeal it upon that ground.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I presume the Senator from Maryland and every Senator is quite familiar with the constitutional provision which confers upon the President authority to grant reprieves and pardons. Of course, the repeal of this section of the act of 1862 will not repeal the Constitution, and I suppose no one denies the authority of the President to grant pardons under the Constitution. The only effect of the passage of the bill under consideration is to repeal the thirteenth section of the act of July 17, 1862. It is possible, as has been suggested by the Senator from Maryland, from the haste with which this bill was hurried through the other branch of Congress, and the anxiety manifested in this body by some of its members to press it to an immediate vote without the usual reference to a committee, that an impression has gone out to the country that by the repeal of this thirteenth section the power of the President to grant pardons and restore to rebels their property would be taken away. Such, however, will not be its effect in my opinion. The President's power to grant pardons and restore property will be just as complete after the passage of this bill repealing the thirteenth section of the act of 1862 as before. The Constitution confers on the President the power "to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment." It is not in the power of Congress to deprive him of this prerogative. A pardon is a remission of the crime or offense, and not of the conviction; and may be granted as well before as after conviction; and it also may be either absolute or conditional. All these questions were settled by decisions of the Attorneys General and of the Supreme Court of the United States years ago. Mr. Wirt, who was Attorney General under Mr. Monroe, gave an opinion, I think in 1820, that the President had authority to grant pardons before conviction. He placed it upon the ground that a pardon was of the offense and not of the conviction for the offense; that the conviction was only evidence of the crime or offense which had been committed. Subsequent Attorneys General have given the same opinion, and the practice of the Government, I believe, has conformed to that opinion. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of ex parte Wells, which is reported in 18 Howard, page 311, and which I have before me, quoted with approbation this passage from Lord Coke:

"A pardon is said by Lord Coke to be a work of mercy, whereby the king, either before attainder, sentence, or conviction, or after, forgiveth any crime, offense, punishment, execution, right, title, debt, or duty, temporal or ecclesiastical."—3 Inst., 233.

The same court, in a case reported in 7 Peters, in which the opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, decided that a pardon may be either absolute or conditional. They quote in that opinion also from common law writers on the subject of pardon and its effect, and say:

"A pardon is a deed to the validity of which delivery is essential, and delivery is not complete without acceptance. It may then be rejected by the person to whom it is tendered; and if it be rejected, we have discovered no power in a court to force it on him."—United States vs. Wilson, 7 Peters, page 161.

The point in that case was the authority of the President to impose a condition in granting a pardon; and the Supreme Court held that that authority existed in the President, and they laid down the rule in both these cases that the power of the President "to grant reprieves and pardons" is to be construed as those words were understood at the time they were incorporated into the Constitution of the United States. The President's power to restore property seized under the confiscation act to its former rebel owners will not be affected by the repeal of the thirteenth section of the act of 1862, as the section is silent on that subject. It is certainly within the power of the President to refuse to restore property to pardoned rebels by making it a condition when he grants the pardon that they shall not claim the property which has been seized by the Government. The President, however, has not generally done this, and by granting absolute pardons has given an order in fact for the restoration of property. It will be seen by the report of General Howard, made to Congress at the last session, that the President did direct property to be restored to a person who had been pardoned, and under the rule adopted in that case General Howard states that he proceeded to restore to pardoned rebels more than four hundred thousand acres of land which had been seized under the confiscation act. I will not undertake to say whether the President has authority to restore this property. He certainly has no such authority where the rights of third parties have intervened. Whenever the property has been condemned under the confiscation act his right to take away the title of an individual who had acquired any interest in the property, and restore it to the former owners would doubtless be gone. Whether he could before, after the mere seizure of the property, is another question; but it is not affected in my opinion by the repeal of the section under consideration.

If the President has this power under the Constitution, it may be asked why then repeal this thirteenth section; what harm does it do? I answer that this thirteenth section is broader than the Constitution; it authorized the President by proclamation to grant pardon and amnesty. The difference, as I understand, between a pardon and an amnesty is this: a pardon is an act of mercy extended to an individual; it must be by deed; it must be pleaded—Chief Justice Marshall says it is essential to its validity that it must be delivered—an amnesty is a general pardon proclaimed by proclamation. This statute undertakes to confer upon the President of the United States authority by general proclamation to grant pardon and amnesty to everybody who has been engaged in the rebellion. The President has already issued general proclamations of amnesty and pardon; there can be no occasion for the exercise of that power hereafter; and therefore there is a propriety in repealing the section of the statute which confers this power upon the President. Let him have such powers as the Constitution gives him; of course Congress cannot take from him those powers; but let us not be a party to conferring any additional powers or any additional facility upon the President to grant pardons to persons engaged in this rebellion who have shown themselves after obtaining pardon so undeserving of the mercy which has been extended to them. Let us repeal that clause which authorized the issuing of proclamations of amnesty. This will at least be an expression of opinion on the part of Congress that general pardons and restoration of property should not be continued; and if the President does continue to pardon rebels and restore their property by individual acts under the Constitution, let him do so without having the sanction of Congress for his act.

Therefore, sir, the committee recommended the passage of this bill, believing that the expression of such an opinion on the part of Congress was but carrying out the expressions of the people of this country, and that we should withhold any encouragement on our part to the granting of general pardons and restorations of property for the future until we can see a better spirit manifested on the part of those who are their recipients.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I understand now that my friend from Illinois thinks that it is necessary to repeal the thirteenth section of the original act, only because, first, it authorizes the President to pardon by proclamation; and, second, it authorizes him by proclamation to declare a general amnesty.

Sir, the power conferred upon the President by the Constitution is as comprehensive as words can make it. He is authorized, or to use the very language of the Constitution, "he shall have power" "to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States." How he is to exercise that power, the Constitution is silent. Whether he is to do it in each particular instance of a man who has committed an offense, or whether, where there is a class of offenders, he may do it in some form so as to include the entire class, the Constitution says nothing about. I should suppose that where the power is conferred upon him absolutely, in general terms, it is for him to decide as to the manner in which he will execute it, or as to the number of cases in which he will exercise it; as to the manner, whether he will execute it by granting to each one a pardon for the alleged offense, or as to those who may be included in it, whether he will grant a pardon to the whole collectively, and whether he will or will not grant it in the form of a proclamation, instead of the form which has usually been adopted.

My recollection is—I think I am not mistaken about it—that after the suppression of what was termed the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania, which became so threatening as to induce General Washington to head his troops and to march with an army collected from Maryland and Pennsylvania and elsewhere, he, I think without any legislative authority on the subject, granted by proclamation an amnesty to all who were concerned in it. I am not aware that he issued a pardon or an amnesty to any individual citizen involved in that insurrection; and I never heard that his mode of exerting the power was questioned.

Now, as to the authority, under the power to comprehend all offenders who may have been involved in any violation of the laws of the United States, the Senate will find by looking at the 74th number of the Federalist, written by Mr. Hamilton, that he assumes that the power is coextensive with the necessity, with the exigency; he assumes that where there are many concerned in an insurrection they may be induced to arrest their progress, or after it has been arrested by other means, they may be pardoned in some general way. I will read a few sentences from that number. After quoting the constitutional provision, he says:

"Humanity and good policy conspire to dictate that the benign prerogative of pardoning should be as little as possible fettered or embarrassed."

Then he goes on to examine the reason which to his mind shows that the power should somewhere exist in any well-constituted Government. It was contended at that time that the power should be in Congress, and in the course of that number he meets that objection to the Constitution as it stood, and he does it by saying:

"On the other hand, as men generally derive confidence from their number they might often encourage each other in an act of obduracy, and might be less sensible to the apprehension of censure for an injudicious or affected clemency. On these accounts one man appears to be a more eligible dispenser of the mercy of Government than a body of men."

So far as to the question whether the power is to be vested in one man or in a body of men, or in other words, whether it should be given to the President or be given to Congress—

"The expediency of vesting the power of pardoning in the President has, if I mistake not, been only contested in relation to the crime of treason. This, it has been urged, ought to have depended upon the assent of one or both of the branches of the legislative body. I shall not deny that there are strong reasons to be assigned for requiring in this particular the concurrence of that body, or of a part of it. As treason is a crime leveled at the immediate being of the society when the laws have once ascertained the guilt of the offender there seems a fitness in referring the expediency of an act of mercy toward him to the judgment of the Legislature. And this ought the rather to be the case as the supposition of the connivance of the Chief Magistrate ought not to be entirely excluded."

He goes on to examine that doctrine and comes to the conclusion that the power ought to be where the Convention had placed it:

"On the other hand, when the sedition had proceeded from causes which had inflamed the resentments of the major party they might often be found obstinate and inexorable when policy demanded a conduct of forbearance and clemency. But the principal argument for reposing the power of pardoning in this case in the Chief Magistrate is this: in seasons of insurrection or rebellion there are often critical moments when a well-timed offer of pardon to the insurgents or rebels may restore the tranquillity of the Commonwealth."

As a means of suppressing the insurrection, while it was going on, Congress not in session—an object not to be accomplished by the issuing of individual pardons; but it may be all-important as a means to an end, that end being the suppression of the rebellion, that there should at such moments, to use the language of the writer, be made an offer of pardon to the insurgents or rebels—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland will suspend his remarks. The morning hour having expired it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday, which is Senate bill No. 456.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the Senate proceeds to other business, I wish to present an amendment to the bill which is before the Senate. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what I send to the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the bill under consideration will be proceeded with. I hope we shall be able to get through with it in a short time, and I move to lay aside the other bill informally until we dispose of the one now under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think you can get through to-day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Have I the floor on the bill that is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to finish what I have to say on that bill.

Mr. WADE. It is with very great reluctance that I should agree to suspend the consideration of the Nebraska bill; perhaps it is one of the most pressing measures here; but I am told that the Senate will adjourn before we can possibly get through with it, for which reason I shall not oppose this motion to continue what was before the Senate in the morning hour; but to-morrow I shall endeavor to take up the Nebraska bill at the earliest period possible.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 456, for the admission of Nebraska as a State, is the unfinished business of Friday, which is before the Senate, and the Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor on that bill. The Senator from Illinois addresses the Chair, the Senator from Indiana being entitled to the floor. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he gives way to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not for the motion which he wishes to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor, and a motion to postpone the consideration of the Nebraska bill cannot be made unless he yields the floor for the purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will not the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a motion to postpone?

Mr. HENDRICKS. For anything else I should yield to the Senator, but not for that motion. I yielded on Friday evening to everybody who desired to propose anything, and I would rather finish what I have got to say on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When this bill was before the Senate on Friday I expressed the regret which I felt at making any opposition to the immediate admission of Nebraska as a State, because I said that my sympathies were with the border settlers, and if indeed it were the desire of the people of Nebraska to come into the Union I should hesitate very much to oppose their desire, but that I felt very much relieved from my embarrassment by the consideration of the fact that of the 7,776 people who voted upon the Constitution 3,888 voted against it, lacking but fifty of being one half of the people who voted upon the subject. I also expressed my gratification at the liberality of the views expressed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] on this question—views that I had not expected from him and judging from his opinions generally expressed on such questions. That Senator said, speaking of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN:]

"The pending amendment proposes to attach a condition to the admission of this State. I do not know whether you can do that. She ought to be admitted, if at all, on the same footing with all the other States. Up to this hour the regulation of the elective franchise has been regarded as a State question. It belongs, under the Constitution as it now stands, exclusively to the States of the Union. We have not proposed to take it away from any State."

Then, sir, after expressing some views in regard to the power of Congress over the southern States, in which I do not concur, the Senator went on to say:

"I do not know what right you have to say that a State shall be admitted not on an equality with every other State, and shall not be allowed to regulate her elective franchise as she pleases."

The broad doctrine is here asserted that when a State is admitted into this Union she must be admitted on terms of equality with the other States; the broad doctrine of the equality of all the States in this Union. And, sir, when Nebraska is admitted I shall regard it as a precedent, after consideration of the question by the Senate, that a State of the Union is to be admitted to representation without reference to the character of her domestic institutions which do not affect her relations to the Federal Government. In other words, I shall regard it as establishing the doctrine that the people of a Territory in forming their State government have a right to form it according to their own pleasure, subject only to the condition that the government shall be republican in form, and that when a State has a right to come here and to be represented she has a right to be represented without reference to the character of her domestic institutions or without complying with any conditions other than those required by the Constitution of the United States.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has expressed the opinion that we are committed to the admission of Nebraska by the enabling act passed in 1864, for he says that the people of Nebraska have complied with the conditions required of them. In some respects the conditions of the enabling act have been agreed to in the constitution which Nebraska has proposed for herself, but certainly the Senator did not wish to be understood as saying that the requirements of the enabling act have been complied with in the adoption of the constitution which is now presented to us. Why, sir, in no respect whatever has the enabling act been complied with. I understand the facts to be that the delegates were elected pursuant to the enabling act, that the delegates met in convention at the time required by that act, and that having thus met, so strong did they know the judgment of the people of the Territory to be against the formation of a State government and the adoption of a constitution, that they adjourned at once without making any constitution, without taking any steps in that direction. The popular opinion in Nebraska was understood to be so decidedly against the policy of forming a State government at the time the delegates met that they adjourned without agreeing upon any provisions of a State constitution whatever; and afterward, at what time I am not prepared to say, the Legislature of the Territory of Nebraska formed this constitution itself. This is not the work of a convention. This constitution was formed, as I understand, by the Legislature of Nebraska. I ask the Senator from Ohio if that was within the spirit, or letter either, of the enabling act? Is it a legislative act to form a State government and to present here a State constitution? Certainly not. And when the territorial Legislature adopted a constitution that constitution was without legal authority or force; but I am free to say that if the people of the Territory being of sufficient numbers had afterward agreed to that constitution in such manner and in such numbers as to satisfy us that it was the choice and desire of the people, then the act of the people would give force and validity to such a constitution. It brings us not to the question whether this State ought to be admitted under the enabling act, but to the question whether the people of Nebraska have agreed to this State constitution.

The Senator from Ohio says that there are eighty-five thousand people in Nebraska.

Mr. WADE. Eighty-eight thousand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Eighty-eight thousand people would give a popular vote of probably 16,000, and more than that—I should say at least 20,000. In the older States, where there are large families represented by the head, the vote is about one fifth of the entire population. In the State of Indiana, where the settlements are now old and where families have grown up and become numerous, the population is about 1,400,000, and the vote is very nearly 300,000, showing about one voter to every five persons in the State. Now, I submit to Senators that the vote in a Territory, in new settlements, is much larger in proportion to the entire population than in old settlements. It is known to the Senator from Ohio, it is known to every western man, that the proportion of unmarried men in the Territories is larger than in the older States, and that the families of the emigrants as a general thing are not so large as in the older States, so that the voting population is larger in new settlements in proportion to the entire population than in the older States.

Then, sir, I am justified, I think, in saying that the voting population of Nebraska would be very nearly 20,000 if there was an entire population of 88,000. With a voting population of from sixteen to twenty thousand, we are asked to admit the State into the Union upon an affirmative vote of 3,938. The constitution had no force until it received the sanction and approval of the people. No act of the territorial Legislature could give it any legal force and power. All the power and validity that it should have as a State constitution and form of government was to be derived from the vote of the people. Then, out of an entire vote of sixteen to twenty thousand, we have 3,938 persons voting in favor of this constitution. Is that such an expression of the popular will as justifies Congress in receiving a State, whose constitution has been so irregularly formed and adopted?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] then, I think, is not able to maintain his position that we are committed by the enabling act; in his language, bound to admit the State because we passed the enabling act. If the people of the Territory had complied with that enabling act, had come here pursuant to its provisions in every respect, then there would be much force in his position; but in the absence of a compliance with almost every requirement of the enabling act, I do not feel that there is any moral obligation on me to vote for the admission.

The next question that presents itself is whether there is such a population in Nebraska as is claimed for it and as will justify us in the admission of the State. I do not believe that there are eighty-eight thousand people in that Territory, although the Senator from Ohio reads a letter from some bureau in the Treasury Department which undertakes to furnish statistics to that Department. The Senator was not informed as to the means at the command of that bureau for ascertaining the population of Nebraska, and I think I am justified in saying that that bureau has no data on which it may make a calculation. There is nothing in the execution of the internal revenue law which furnishes any information upon that subject. There is no tax upon the head which enables the revenue officers to know the number of persons by the assessment. There is no census required to be taken by the revenue officers. It is no part of their official duty, and if they have expressed any opinion on the subject, it is simply an opinion and not based upon any information in the office; and I think, sir, the opinion expressed by the head of that bureau is not correct.

In 1860, when the census of the United States was taken, Nebraska had 28,841 inhabitants. It is known to every Senator that since 1860 the population of the western States and the Territories has not to any considerable extent increased. The war stopped emigration from the eastern portion of the country to the Territories; and I undertake to express the opinion that at the close of the war it is very doubtful whether Nebraska had as large a population as she had in 1860. I doubt whether in the spring of 1865, at the surrender of the southern armies, there was so large a population in the Territory of Nebraska as there was when the census was taken in 1860. I admit that since the close of the war immigration has again set in to the Territories, and that the immigration is now in very large numbers to Nebraska; that the construction of the great railroad from Omaha westward has invited immigration. But, sir, that is not an answer to the objection which is now made that when this constitution was submitted to the people and it received a popular vote; there was not a population that justified the formation of a State government. Suppose that next year there may be 100,000 people in Nebraska, that 100,000 ought to have a voice in the making of the State's government. If in June last, when the vote was had upon the constitution, there were but thirty, forty, or fifty thousand, had that thirty, forty, or fifty thousand people a right to form the State government which shall be over the one hundred or one hundred and fifty thousand that may be there next year? When the population is filled up to such a number as justifies the formation of a State government, that entire population ought to have a voice in the formation of the government that shall be established.

In June, upon a very interesting question, the question of a State constitution, the entire vote was 7,776, showing a population of perhaps 85,000. I understood the Senator from Ohio to say that in October at the popular election for State officers, for a Legislature, for a member of Congress, a very important election, when all the voters were likely to be out, the entire vote was about 9,000. Now, sir, if the voting population is about one fifth of the entire population, that would show the entire population of Nebraska to be in October about 45,000, about one half the number assumed by the Senator from Ohio. If there are about 85,000 people in Nebraska, then the vote in October ought to have been about twice as large as it was. A population in a Territory of 85,000 will show a voting population of at least 18,000, perhaps 20,000; but that voting population is not there. When they voted upon their constitution less than 8,000 votes were polled, and when they voted under the State government for all the officers of the State, for the member of Congress, and for the Legislature that was to elect Senators, upon a most exciting occasion, when the political excitement perhaps was as high as it has ever been in the Territories, only about 9,000 votes were cast. Is any Senator justified, then, in saying that the population of Nebraska is above forty or fifty thousand? I assume that the evidence before us does not justify the opinion that the population is above that number. With a census in 1860 of 28,000, with a vote in June upon the constitution of about 7,776, with a vote in October upon an election that called out the entire population, at least as fully as any popular election can call out the voting population, the entire vote was but 9,000. Then, sir, from the information that is before the Senate, (I exclude the opinion that came from the Bureau of Statistics,) we are not justified in saying that the entire population of Nebraska at the time of the adoption of the constitution was more than 35,000, at the time of the State election more than forty or forty-five thousand; and then it presents the question whether that population ought to form a State government and be admitted to representation in this Hall and in the other House.

I know very well, as was said by the Senator from Ohio, that there is no law upon the subject and no very uniform practice; but it has come to be the opinion that before a Territory shall be admitted as a State it ought to have a population entitling it to a Representative in the other House, or very nearly so. In the States each section of country is entitled to a Representative in the House when the population is about 127,000, and with a less population than that a section of a State is not entitled to a Representative. Upon what principle, then, has one third of that population or one half of that population in a Territory the right to a voice in the House of Representatives? Upon what principle can 40,000 people living in the Territory of Nebraska claim the same voice in the Senate of the United States that is given to the million and a half of people of the State of Indiana? I am not upon this occasion going to complain of the unequal distribution of political power in the Senate; we all know it; it is felt by the country; but it is under a compromise of the Constitution, and I make no war against it now. But, sir, when we feel it, shall we increase it? Shall we give to a people in a Territory two Senators in this body when they have a population not half enough to entitle them to a Representative in the House of Representatives? I think it ought not to be; and upon that ground, and that ground only, I vote against this bill. Had there been a sufficient population in Nebraska and had the people in fact of that Territory expressed themselves in favor of this Constitution, I should most cheerfully vote for her admission.

I think that the consideration to which reference has been made in the course of this debate does not influence my judgment. The fact that Senators and a Representative belonging to a particular political party have been elected, I think would not influence my judgment. I simply ask that when a new State seeks admission she shall have such a population as reasonably and fairly entitles her to a Representative in the House; and I think that is consistent with the principles of the Government and with the almost uniform practice of the Government.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] referred to another subject, not connected with the admission of this State, to which I shall allude but for a moment. He expressed the opinion that the constitutional amendment which received the sanction of this body and of the other House at the last session was a mild proposition, and was just and fair toward the southern States. I think I recollect to have asked that Senator at the last session a question which he did not then answer, and I will repeat the question to him now, and let him then, as a representative of one of the States of this Union, say whether one of the provisions of the constitutional amendment is fair. That amendment was so carefully and artfully framed as to leave the northern States a representation of from fifteen to twenty Representatives in the other House, based upon a non-voting population. It was so carefully framed as to leave to Missouri, to Tennessee, to West Virginia, and to Maryland their full representation, when one half of their people by State policy and legislation are denied the right of voting. A full representation is allowed to four States, notwithstanding one half of their population is disfranchised. A full representation, including a basis of non-voting population, securing twenty Representatives in the House, is left to the northern States.

Now, is it right in a constitutional amendment to give to one State a representation based upon a non-voting population and to deny it to another State because a particular population is not allowed to vote? Is it right, is it just, is it a mild and fair proposition to say that New York may retain four or five Representatives based upon a non-voting population and to deny to Georgia representation for her non-voting population? Is it equal and just that one State shall be represented for her non-voting population and another State not represented for her non-voting population? That is the question. The Senator at the last session did not answer it, and I think it cannot be answered.

I know it may be said that these people in the South have been in a state of rebellion. The wickedness and folly of the southern States in going into that rebellion cannot be too strongly expressed by the Senator from Ohio; but when they come back by their representation into this body and into the other House do they come as States?

Mr. WADE. Does the Senator contend that the constitutional amendment provided that they might exclude a portion of their population from voting in New York, Ohio, or any other State, and still have representation for that portion in the other House?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. WADE. I do not so understand it at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no question about it.

Mr. WADE. The amendment, as I understand it, refers to all the States alike in that particular.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir.

Mr. WADE. But I take a distinction between the power of this Government over States that have forfeited their rights by rebellion and those that never have.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not discussing the view of the Senator who has just addressed the Senate, but that of his colleague. His colleague has said that the amendment proposed at the last session was a fair, a mild, and a just one; that because of its character in these respects great advantage was secured to the party with which he acted during the last political contest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do I understand the Senator to wish an answer to his question now?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, no. Now, I will call the attention of the Senator from Ohio who interrupted me a moment since to the language of this amendment:

"Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed."

That is a general proposition and includes as a representative basis all the population of the States, except Indians not taxed.

"But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

It requires some mathematical ability to understand this section, but I think the Senator will not have much trouble in arriving at the opinion which I have expressed, that it leaves to the northern States fifteen or twenty Representatives, based upon a non-voting population, while it takes from the southern States entirely all representation based upon their non-voting population, for I will ask the attention of the Senator to the language:

"When the right to vote is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State."

That is general; that would include all; but it goes on:

"Being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States."

Then they are not to be counted; and it further proceeds:

"Or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion."

That language was inserted "except for participation in rebellion" so as to give Missouri her full representation, so as to give Tennessee her full representation, and the same of West Virginia and Maryland. They are not excluded from the basis of representation because they are excepted from the exclusion. So the exclusion from the basis of representation does not include those who are not citizens of the United States. It is very artfully, very carefully prepared. It presents simply the question, whether it is equality among the States of this Union that one State shall have a representation upon a described class of her population, and another State shall not be allowed a representation upon such class.

Mr. CRAGIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGIN. Does that constitutional amendment exclude the non-voting foreign population of the southern States more than of the northern States?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly not.

Mr. CRAGIN. That is the point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. "That is the point," the Senator says; and what is the point? That the southern States, according to the census, would not perhaps have one Representative based upon a foreign population, while the northern States, as was stated by one of the most distinguished Representatives at the last session, have from fifteen to twenty Representatives based upon a non-voting population. It cannot be said now that the negroes are not citizens and therefore are not to be counted for the purposes of representation. The legislation of Congress has undertaken to make them citizens and to give them political equality. Then, sir, if you say that a non-voting population, a population excluded by the laws of a particular State because of the policy of that State, shall be allowed as the basis of representation in favor of that State, why not carry the same doctrine into other States?

I am not going to refer to the intimations of the Senator from Ohio, that if the southern States do not accept of this constitutional amendment governments will be established over them. Of course we shall see what will be done. I am not going to discuss that question now. It has been proposed to Congress, and I suppose will come up for our consideration. All that I undertook to discuss at this time was the proposition of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that the constitutional amendment was a fair one, and that it was equal. I like the doctrine of his colleague [Mr. WADE] that the States coming into this Union are to come in as equals, and that we have no right to impose conditions on Nebraska that are not to be imposed upon other States. I like that doctrine. I believe that doctrine is to be the salvation of this country when it is entirely saved. I do not believe that this Union can permanently rest quietly and securely for the prosperity and greatness of this people on a Constitution that makes the States unequal in the Union. I look forward to the time when all the States shall be here—here not upon terms and conditions other than those prescribed in the formation of the Government, but here, according to the argument of the Senator from Ohio in regard to Nebraska, as equals. I look forward to that time. I have my hope of the complete restoration and prosperity of our country.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana having delivered his speech to the Senate, and insisted upon delivering it without allowing the Senate to determine what business it would proceed with, I move now that the subject under consideration be laid aside for the purpose of proceeding with the bill upon which we were then acting.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Illinois has made a remark which in my judgment is not in good taste, and not within the proprieties of the Senate. I had the floor; it was my right to complete the remarks that I had to make. I had desired to complete these remarks very briefly on Friday evening, but the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] asked me to yield that he might make a proposition; then another Senator asked me to yield still further, and as a matter of course I yielded. Now the Senator from Illinois, because I desired that what I said on Friday and what I had to say to-day should not be entirely disconnected and separated, intimates that I sought to interpose my will against the desire of the Senate. I do not think he is authorized to say that; I do not think he is authorized in saying that the Senate desired to take up the bill he refers to—a bill, according to his own showing, that is not of much practical importance. I proposed to discuss a bill that was of practical importance; he desired that I should take my seat in the midst of an argument; I did not choose to yield to him upon that. It was not between me and the Senate. The Senator insisted that I should yield to him that he might interpose a motion; I refused to do it; it is a question between him and myself. I did not yield to him when he wished to make a motion to call up another bill, and that is not the subject of any lecture.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, before the motion is put in regard to postponing this bill and taking up another, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to permit me to substitute an amendment, drawn in somewhat different language but substantially the same thing, for the one which I presented the other day, it is simply designating the time at which the election shall be held. I desire that it may be printed when the bill goes over. I ask that permission unanimously of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent of the Senate to interpose to the bill now before the Senate an amendment varying somewhat the terms of the amendment heretofore offered by him.

Mr. BROWN. To withdraw the one I offered the other day and substitute in its place what I now present and ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request made by the Senator from Missouri, and the amendment which he now presents will be received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I did not say that the Senate desired to go on with the other bill. I said the Senator from Indiana refused to allow the Senate to determine what business it would proceed with. We had been proceeding with the other bill, and it is the first time within my knowledge as a member here where any Senator has insisted upon a right to claim the floor over from a previous day without allowing the Senate to determine what business it would go on with. The Senator had a right to do it. I have no controversy with him. If the Senate had not thought proper to go on with the bill to which I have called attention I should have had no objection to going on with that upon which he has spoken, but I thought it proper and my duty, having charge of that bill, to ask the Senate to continue it. The Senator thought proper, having a right to the floor, to deny the opportunity to me and to the Senate to pass upon it. It was his right; I do not complain of him. I now move that we proceed with the bill which we had under consideration at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. COWAN. I hope not, Mr. President. At the opening of the session this morning I had no objection whatever to proceeding with the bill of the honorable Senator from Illinois, but he having urged that and having failed, the Senate having taken up the bill now before them, I desire to express my opinions upon it, and I should very much prefer to go on this afternoon. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will continue the consideration of the bill they now have in hand. I am not aware that there is any other business before the Senate which requires immediate action. If I am properly informed, and I presume I am, that business which it is intended shall supersede this bill can as well be attended to to-morrow as to-day. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the Nebraska bill to-day.

Mr. WADE. I barely wish to say, having charge of the Nebraska bill, that the reason why I have not insisted with more pertinacity upon continuing the debate on it to-day is that I understand the Senators from New Jersey propose at two o'clock to announce the death of our late associate, Senator WRIGHT. That announcement will of course adjourn the Senate pretty early, and I did not suppose we could make much progress with the bill to-day; hence I did not feel like pressing it as I otherwise would. I believe that when gentlemen wish to make announcements of that kind it is not usual to insist on pressing other business, and hence I yielded.

Mr. COWAN. Why not let them take Thursday?

Mr. WADE. They propose to do it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. COWAN. If the consideration of this bill is to be postponed I would ask that it be postponed until after the holidays, after the adjournment which I understand has been voted by both Houses. If we are to discuss this bill and determine it now, we I think had better talk upon it while we are at it, and allow the honorable Senator from New Jersey to take up the funeral obsequies of Senator WRIGHT on Thursday. If it is to go over at all, let it go over until after the holidays. I have no objection to that; but if it is to be discussed and determined now, I would be glad that the discussion should be continued until we arrive at a vote, if that vote can be attained to-morrow, and I think it can. I do not see any objection to this course. I cannot see any objection on the part of anybody. The honorable Senator from Ohio who has this bill in charge is exceedingly anxious that it should be disposed of, as I understand him.

Mr. WADE. I am.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senators from New Jersey of course wish to do the honors to their departed colleague. That is all meritorious and proper. I feel that as strongly as anybody, but that is one of those things which is to be considered ab extra. It is not in the natural business of the Senate and may as well be postponed until Thursday as to be inaugurated to-day. I suppose that these eulogies will not spoil by putting them over two or three days longer. I should think not. Those things are usually prepared, cut and dried, written, elaborated; and I should very much prefer anything that I have to say upon the admission of Nebraska should be said to-day. I therefore hope the motion to postpone will not prevail.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if it had not been stated to the Senate by the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. WADE] that it was the purpose of the successor of the late Mr. WRIGHT to announce his death to-day, I should have interposed no objection to the postponing of that purpose to some future day, but when that announcement has been made it appears to me to be but respectful to the memory of the deceased and respectful to his colleagues, that the announcement should be made as they intended when they came into the Chamber. It can cost us but little time, and that little may be considered as well spent when it is devoted to doing some honor to the memory of a man with whom we associated so long and whom we regarded personally so well. I hope, therefore, that the honorable members from New Jersey will not delay the design which they had, as I understand, when they came into the Chamber, but will make the announcement at the very hour they intended to make it when they came into the Chamber.

Mr. WADE. I wish to give notice that to-morrow early I shall move to rescind that joint resolution of adjournment, and I shall assign my reasons for it. It is exceedingly doubtful, as we have sent an important bill to the President, whether if he should return it during that adjournment, as he would have the right to do, it would not fail if we stood adjourned. I shall call up the matter in the morning and insist upon rescinding the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. As the Senator from Ohio has raised a question with regard to what the President might do during this recess, I merely wish to remark that there is another way in which that difficulty may be obviated. Let the Secretary of the Senate retain the bill until after the recess, or until such time in the recess that the eleven days allowed to the President will expire after the return of Congress. Then there can be no evil consequence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We do not want to discuss that now.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is the difficulty mentioned by the member from Ohio, certainly. If the bill which he has in charge is passed to-morrow or the next day the President will have ten days to consider it, and if the ten days expire during the recess perhaps the measure will fail. I do not know that the President will take the ten days; I have no knowledge on the subject. The only certain way of guarding against it would be to postpone the consideration of the measure until after the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill which was under consideration by the Senate at the expiration of the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

POWER OF AMNESTY AND PARDON.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is the bill to repeal the thirteenth section of the confiscation act now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I desire to offer the amendment which I attempted before to get in. I have handed it to the Secretary.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the act entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to enter into any discussion of the merits of the amendment which I have offered, but shall content myself for the present with asking that the vote upon it, when taken, shall be taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the discussion of this bill was interrupted at the expiration of the morning hour, the Senator from Maryland was on the floor, and the consideration of the bill being now resumed he is again entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise, sir, not for the purpose of discussing the bill now, but to say that I yield the floor to the Senator from New Jersey.

DEATH OF SENATOR WRIGHT.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I rise to announce the death of Senator WRIGHT, of New Jersey, and to move appropriate action relative thereto by the Senate.

It is, sir, to me a melancholy reflection that the seat to which I am appointed was made vacant by death, and that now the duty devolves on me of announcing the sad event.

Nature certifies to us of God! Through the familiar events of the daily life of its divine Author the sublime truths of Christianity are conveyed. But it is by the providences of our lives, and especially when the bolt of mortality falls upon an associate, that our attention to the great truths of our being is attracted. We need, then, no apology for pausing that we may recognize the event and each for himself apply the lesson of death, for death is the most august of visitants to his victim and the greatest of moralists to the living. Since the recent session and on the 1st of November last, Senator WRIGHT, of New Jersey, died at his residence in Newark. For months, with much suffering, he faced the stern messenger, made minute preparation for his departure, and then in a strength not his own he calmly entered immortality.

That is the event I have risen to announce. It is an event that has occurred to millions on millions, to the child, to the mother "when she felt for the first time her first-born's breath," to the warrior and the patriot column on the field of carnage; and yet since that immortality, indicated by the conjectures of the ancients and almost proven by the toilsome aspirations of man in all ages for a fame that survives the grave, has been clearly revealed, no one can consider the event other than momentous and suggestive. It is proper that I state the fact, and it is becoming that I leave its lessons to those who hear me.

The original ancestor from whom Mr. WRIGHT was the sixth in descent settled in Virginia. Dr. William Wright resided in Rockland county, New York, where in 1790 his son, the subject of these remarks, was born.

The father died while the son was a boy preparing for college. Thus diverted from his studies, he gave his attention for several years to mercantile occupations, and in 1823, in the morning of his manhood, he moved to Newark and engaged extensively in manufacturing pursuits.

His district, the State of New Jersey, now more extensively engaged in manufacturing than any in the Union, as its revenue returns show, in 1842 made Mr. WRIGHT its Representative in Congress. He was reelected in 1844. In 1853 he was elected Senator and served his full term. He was reelected to the Senate in 1863, and having served about half his term the inexorable mandate terminated his career.

His training and habit had been such that when his constituents repeatedly reelected him they did not anticipate that he would take a prominent part in debate on the questions before the country. But there are those here who could bear witness that he, with sound judgment, intelligence, and fidelity, discharged the very many other duties of Senator and Representative. And I can bear witness that he was true to that class of political sentiments which he avowed; and in a Government which is representative and where the will of the people is sovereign, it is a commendation that one is true to the sentiment of the party that elected him. When prostrated by disease, when death held him by the hand, when the fires of ambition had burned out, he was carried to the Capitol that he might give his views in accordance with the views of those who elected him. And he manifested his devotion to the country by consenting that his only son should join its defenders when a few dollars from his ample fortune could have procured a substitute.

His urbanity and gentlemanly bearing and sentiment were marked features of the man, and known to all who ever had intercourse with him. For many years I lived his immediate neighbor and, although differing with him politically, such was his tolerant and generous estimate of the opinions of others that not one word ever disturbed the flow of kind and friendly feeling between us. Socially he was hospitable and took true enjoyment in the offices and delicacies of friendship. His church commends his charity, while others know it was not confined to any sect or class. As a man of business he was diligent, intelligent, and enterprising and obstructions and difficulties gave way to his energy.

He started life with that poverty that early orphanage entailed and was the architect of his own fortune. He did much to promote the internal improvement of the State and to advance the manufacturing interests of the country. His marked success in life illustrates the genius of our free institutions.

But, sir, Mr. WRIGHT, notwithstanding his energy and enterprise, his wealth and civic honors, is gone. The physical mechanism by and with which he lived here has fallen into decay, but the immaterial, as independent of that mechanism as are the motive powers of the earth of the machinery they move, still lives, but not here. And so the representatives of this people who are molding and shaping the destinies of a nation destined to be greater than ever known to history must, when the irreversible sentence goes forth, leave their tenements, taking with them as they go the record here made and leaving to the world the momentous results of their labor.

Sir, New Jersey within the last few years has suffered much from the havoc of death. I speak not, of course, of the noble youths whose patriot graves, in common with those from other States, furrow the land. I refer not to Taylor and Bayard and the intrepid Kearney, who shot through the war like a blazing star through a midnight sky, or to a host of others whose persons rise before me and whose names tremble on my lips, but of men known and valued in the civic walks of the nation.

Speaker Pennington is gone. Long valued at home, he appeared in the national councils at a critical period. The nation was about passing the fearful ordeal. Then Speaker Pennington, more by his cordial integrity than by the rigid enforcement of rules, controlled and calmed the fierce and turbulent spirits of the Representatives of the people. He is gone.

Minister Dayton, worn out by anxiety for his country at a foreign court, has fallen like a sentry at his post.

Robert F. Stockton, who in former years illustrated the prowess of the Navy, once a Senator here, a descendant from one who signed the immortal paper which declares that "all men are created equal," has recently been gathered to his fathers.

But I forbear; men die but the nation lives. It has been cast into a furnace seven times heated, out of which it has come, as has been eloquently written, like the young Jews of Babylon, with nothing destroyed except the chains that fettered it. May we not carry the figure further and say that our deliverance was because walking with the nation in the furnace was one having the form of the Son of God. Heaven grant that his simile may here terminate, and that they who cast the nation in may not, in their rashness, be consumed by the very fire they enkindled.

I move the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM WRIGHT, while a Senator in Congress from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of the Senate will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That these proceedings be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Secretary of the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, I am painfully oppressed with the reflection that the first words which it becomes my duty to utter in this Chamber must be words of sadness, such as are befitting the announcement just made by my colleague, that death has again invaded the senatorial circle.

You have listened to the official announcement that Senator WILLIAM WRIGHT, of New Jersey, is no more. He closed a long, active, and honorable life on the 1st day of November last, at his own home, in the city of Newark, where he had lived for nearly half a century surrounded by his family and friends, ministered to in his last hours by those he loved best on earth, and sustained in his passage through "the dark valley" by the consolations of the Christian's faith.

Of his life and character my colleague, who knew him more intimately than I did, has spoken so fully and in such fitting terms that there is little left for me but to express my full accord in all the kindly words which he has said.

It has already been said that Mr. WRIGHT was a business man, a merchant and manufacturer, and I beg to add that he was a worthy type of that large class whose enterprise and energy have done so much to develop the resources and promote the prosperity of our great country. He was a self-made man, the architect of his own fortune, and throughout a long business life, in which he accumulated his large fortune, he exhibited the leading traits of a true merchant, intelligence and integrity, combined with industry and energy.

He was also a man of political distinction. New Jersey, the State of his adoption, honored him with the highest positions within her gift, having twice elected him to a seat in this body, and I can bear testimony to his fidelity to the principles and measures of the political party which invested him with official power. I had not the honor to serve with him in the Senate, but I am sure he brought to the discharge of his duties here a sound and discriminating mind, with a store of valuable information in regard to the trade and commerce and manufactures of the nation which could not be otherwise than useful and important to the Senate and the nation in the position he for some years occupied of chairman of the Senate Committee on Manufactures.

I am aware that during his long senatorial career he never ventured to enter the arena of debate in this Chamber. I am not surprised at this. Mr. WRIGHT was naturally a modest man, a virtue not so common in these latter days as to be altogether despised. He made no claim to facility in the forms of speech. Merchants and men of business are seldom men of many words. They are usually men of action, of deeds. They write their thoughts in the enduring monuments of great enterprises which mark a nation's progress in her onward march to a higher civilization.

The active, earnest, stirring life of a business man, with its engrossing cares and manifold anxieties, especially in this country where the brain is always run to its maximum capacity, affords no time to cultivate the flowers of rhetoric or the graces of elocution. If you would have facility in the forms of speech, readiness and efficiency in debate, with the power of eloquence and the graces of oratory, "The applause of listening senates to command," you must look for these high attainments in the learned professions to which the scholars and men of culture of our land so naturally gravitate. But if you would originate "enterprises of great pith and moment," if you would open up intercourse with far distant lands, with Ethiopia and the islands of the sea, and widen the boundaries of your Christian civilization, you must then look to the men of action, the men who control your trade and commerce and send their white-winged messengers into every sea under the heavens, carrying the Bible and the missionary to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Nay, more, if you would put a girdle about the earth, along which to send the flashing lightning as the courier of your thoughts and wishes through "the dark unfathomed caves of ocean" from continent to continent in the twinkling of an eye, you must call from the counting-room the indomitable will, the sleepless energy, and the sublime faith of an American merchant to perform the service.

If, then, the fact be admitted that my late colleague hesitated to engage in the discussions of this august body, let it be remembered that his busy life afforded neither time nor opportunity for training in this direction. He studied men rather than books; and I am sure, acknowledging the value even in this Chamber of such knowledge as he possessed, you will appreciate the modesty and approve rather than condemn the motives which impelled him in such a presence as this to remain silent.

That Mr. WRIGHT was a kind-hearted, courteous gentleman, scrupulously careful of all the proprieties of domestic, social, and public life, the Senate and all who knew him will bear testimony. His private character was I believe without a stain. He enjoyed the respect and confidence of the people with whom he lived so long, and occupied a prominent place in the business community in which he moved. He lived to a good old age, having passed the allotted years of threescore and ten, and now "he rests from his labors."

And here, perhaps, having paid my tribute of respect to my departed colleague, I should pause. But the Senate will indulge me in a single reflection. Four times during the current year the angel of death has thrown its shadow over this Hall. Collamer and Foot and Lane and WRIGHT have fallen at their post of duty. And shall we not draw from these lessons following each other in such rapid succession fresh admonitions that we too are mortal; that senatorial robes are as vulnerable to the shafts of death as the tattered garments of the lowliest poverty? And gathering instruction and wisdom from these solemn events—remembering that life is short and duty pressing,

"And our hearts though stout and brave
Still like muffled drums are beating Funeral marches to the grave," shall we not draw therefrom fresh motives for renewed activity and zeal in the performance of the grave duties that lie before us, and in view not only of the brevity of human life, but also of the uncertain tenure by which it is held, be led to adopt the invocation of the Psalmist, "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom?"

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, my acquaintance with our deceased colleague began several years before I became with him a member of the Senate. Having then allotted to us adjoining seats, that acquaintance soon ripened into intimacy, which continued unabated to the last day of his attendance in the Chamber. I was thus afforded an opportunity to form an opinion of him as a man and a public servant, and to esteem him highly in both characters. In the first he possessed every quality to inspire confidence and win respect. Beginning life with no resources except such as industry, enterprise, and integrity afford—resources that in our country, if not in every other, never fail when properly used to achieve success—he soon secured the esteem of the community in which he cast his lot, and almost at once earned for himself and family a competency, and years before his death a fortune. This, and a spotless character, an inheritance far more valuable than wealth, he has left behind him, the only solace there can be to the affliction which death under any circumstance ever brings to a surviving wife and children. Nothing can fully supply to them the happiness of their domestic circle caused by the kindness of heart, liberality, and domestic habits of the husband and father. These they can never more enjoy but in memory. In memory, however, they will live, and be a constant source of comfort and happiness. And they will have also this other and higher consolation, that in the world to which he has been translated, and where he is to account for his conduct in this, he is to be judged according to the "integrity" that was in him, and that by such a judgment he can never suffer. Nor was Mr. WRIGHT's excellence in private life limited to his household. As a friend he was sincere and constant, and in supplying the wants of the suffering was, as I am informed, ever most liberal.

Of his public character I know enough to say that it was worthy of praise. His political opinions were of the school of Jefferson and Madison and of the statesmen who came into power in the beginning of the century, the Republicans of that day. He believed, as his teachers did, that a strict as distinguished from what was termed a liberal construction of the Constitution of the United States, and a liberal as distinguished from a strict construction of the rights reserved to the States and the people by that Constitution, was not only conducive to the harmonious operation of both Governments, but absolutely necessary to their continuing existence. With those great men who participated in the framing of the Constitution and in procuring for it the sanction of the people of each State, Mr. WRIGHT was convinced that the preservation inviolate of the rights which the States and the people not only did not delegate, but for greater security by an amendment expressly and in the strongest terms reserved, was vital to the success of the Government. To govern a territory then more extensive than that of almost any other one nation, and certain to be in a comparatively brief future greatly enlarged, he thought, as they thought, could only be done consistently with political liberty through the combined operation of the General and State Governments, the one dealing with subjects that the others were incompetent to manage, and they with those that the first was equally incompetent to manage.

This is not a fit occasion to discuss the correctness of this opinion. Mr. WRIGHT, however—and this it is inadmissible to state—was sincere in holding it and in believing that it was vindicated by the fact which he thought to be well authenticated, that with the doctrine the country for more than half a century had enjoyed almost unbroken peace and prosperity and undisturbed harmony within its limits. He also thought that the prevailing political doctrines of the day served to disturb such peace, arrest such prosperity, and interrupt such harmony, and that the principal cause was to be referred to what he believed to be true, the absorption of the most important of the rights and powers of the States in those assumed by the General Government.

In the last conversation I had with him he expressed this sentiment in a few words and with evident sincerity, for he knew that death was near at hand. He said in substance that from this cause he feared our country was in imminent peril. I trust that he ceased to have this apprehension before the final hour of his departure from the world. I trust so, for I can imagine that even the pang of leaving loved ones behind, acute as this must always be, must be made the more acute by the fear that countrymen are ever to lose the priceless blessings of a Government founded on principles of liberty, and so framed in its powers, in their limitations, and in the checks calculated to guard against their abuse, as to promise an ever-enduring existence.

May I be excused for saying that, were I to die now and in the possession of my consciousness, that additional pang would not be felt by me; the honorable and patriotic men in whose presence I stand I know will never designedly adopt measures or pursue a policy which they believe will result in so dire a calamity; a calamity which would deprive them and their countrymen of the invaluable inheritance of freedom secured and regulated by law. Clouds and darkness may for a time involve us in gloom, but it cannot be that they will not ere long be dispelled and the country be seen again in all its original brightness, with every one of its lights restored, transfusing equal happiness throughout our wide domain, exciting the wonder and admiration of the world, and proving that we can preserve the admirable institutions, Federal and State, which our fathers successfully labored to establish, and under which we have reached a place in the community of nations of which we have reason to be proud and to which they now render all proper respect.

In joining in this tribute to the memory of our departed brother, I conclude with saying what I said to him on the occasion referred to, let us not despair, let us not bate "a jot of heart and hope, but still bear up and steer right onward," and all will yet be well. And if it be given to departed spirits to know the things of this world, when that is seen his happiness, great as it may now be, will be the greater; for his love of country was so sincere and intense that he will ever rejoice in its continuing safety and prosperity.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I had no intimation that any commemoration of the death, life, and character of Senator WRIGHT would take place to-day; nor had I until the resolutions now under consideration were moved, any reflections or thoughts connected with such an occasion. But I am impelled by my great respect for the deceased while living, and by my approbation of the honor that is being paid to his memory, and of the sentiments expressed in the resolutions, to give them my avowed support.

I first became acquainted with Senator WRIGHT about twenty-five years ago in the House of Representatives, and served four years with him in that branch of Congress. When we parted in that Hall I never met with him until he had been reelected a Senator the second or third time from New Jersey, and took his seat on this floor to fill a term which had not elapsed when he died.

During our service together, both in the House and in the Senate, it was my privilege and pleasure to have possessed his friendship and confidence. When in the House he was what was denominated a Whig in his politics, and was a devoted personal and political friend of the great statesman of the West; and he being of a frank and genial, though quiet disposition, we formed close relations of friendship and mutual respect.

When Mr. WRIGHT and I met again in the Senate, I learned from him what I had before from the public prints, that he had accepted the name and party position of Democrat; but as Whig or Democrat he never was an extreme partisan; and in his politics and all the affairs of life he was characterized by signal candor and moderation. With him the partisan was always subordinate to the patriot. There was no ambition or selfishness in his adherence to his party; he was always faithful to it, but that fidelity was won and retained by his conviction that its principles, measures, and policy were the best for the whole country. He was a merchant, intelligent, honest, diligent, and persevering, and affluence rewarded the proper pursuit of his noble profession. He never debated in either House, but no member had a more correct comprehension of every measure and proposition upon which he was called to vote. He examined them all in the broad and distinct light of an intelligent and virtuous citizen, an experienced and enlightened merchant, and a lofty patriotism that was devoted to his whole country and all her interests.

It has been said that Senator WRIGHT was modest; he was preëminently so; but he was equally courageous, public-spirited, charitable, generous, and hospitable, and he covered all those high and attractive attributes with the veil of modesty.

Nature made Senator WRIGHT a gentleman, and the noble qualities of the true gentleman with him were confirmed, polished, and illustrated by his whole life. In the Representative Hall, in the Senate Chamber, in the social circle, I never knew him to be guilty of an impropriety, and he was among the few men I have known that I believed to be incapable of that sort of delinquency.

Mr. WRIGHT never attracted to himself much of the public gaze, yet in his day and generation he was an exalted public-benefactor. He has left, both as a private citizen and a public man, the example of a life active, efficient, unobtrusive, successful, useful, and adorned by every virtue. Would that we had many, yea, millions of Mr. Wrights of the same moral and intellectual stature, and that the destinies of our country were given to them; it would not only be delivered from its present confusion and perils, but it would be borne along peacefully, prosperously, and gloriously to fortunes far above all the past and which no imagination can compass.

Mr. President, I have been more than gratified, not by the strains of panegyric, but the story of simple truth told of him by the Senators from New Jersey and Maryland, and by the opportunity of giving my own humble tribute to so much of departed worth.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and the Senate adjourned.

The House divided on seconding the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 47, noes 37; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. Cook and Mr. BRANDEGEE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 38.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to fix the compensation of the officers of the revenue-cutter service, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill in relation to the revenue-cutter service; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the bills I have just introduced, with the papers accompanying the same, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF PAPERS IN DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH introduced a joint resolution to allow members of Congress to inspect papers in the Post Office Department; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to allow Senators and members of Congress to examine all papers and recommendations for office appertaining to postmasters, post offices, and other postal matters in their several States and congressional districts.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to modify his resolution so as to include papers in the Treasury Department.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must decline.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move to lay the joint resolution on the table, and on that question I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 31, nays 116, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyer, Brandegee, Campbell, Cooper, Dawes, Eldridge, Finck, Aaron Harding, Hooper, James R. Hubbell, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, George V. The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired the joint resolution will go over to the next Monday when the House shall be in session.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 14, 1866.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate House bill No. 876, making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, for the purpose of correcting an error in the engrossment of the amendments of the Senate to said bill.

Attest: J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate were concurred in by the House, and the motions to reconsider laid upon the table. It will therefore require unanimous consent to comply with the request of the Senate.

No objection was made.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THE HOLIDAYS.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, the House proceeded to consider the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House, in relation to the adjournment of Congress over the holidays.

The amendment was to insert the words "Senate and" between the words "the" and "House;" so that the resolution will read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the Senate and House adjourn on Thursday the 20th instant, they adjourn to meet on Thursday the 3d day of January next.

The question was upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the adoption of that motion will be to carry the original resolution with it.

Mr. STEVENS. That is what I want to accomplish.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 1) entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia;" whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

THE RUSSIAN EMPEROR.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I communicate a translation of a letter of the 17th of August last, addressed to me by His Majesty, Alexander, Emperor of Russia, in reply to the joint resolution of Congress, approved on the 16th day of May, 1866, relating to the attempted assassination of the Emperor, a certified copy of which was in compliance with the request of Congress forwarded to His Majesty by the hands of Gustavus V. Fox, late Assistant Secretary of the Navy of the United States.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1866.

Mr. MAYNARD: Would it be in order to call for the reading of the translation accompanying this message?

The SPEAKER: It will be read, if any gentleman calls for it.

Mr. MAYNARD: I call for the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Translation.]

His Majesty the Emperor of Russia to the President of the United States of America:

PETERHOF, 17th August, 1866.

I have received from the hands of Mr. Fox the resolution of the Congress of the United States of America on the occasion of the providential grace of which I have been the object.

That mark of sympathy has moved me sensibly. It is not alone personal; it attests once more the sentiments that bind the American nation to that of Russia.

The two peoples have no injuries to remember, but only good relations. Under all circumstances new proofs of mutual benevolence are added.

These cordial relations are as conducive to their reciprocal interests as to the good of civilization and humanity, and answer the designs of divine Providence, whose will is peace and concord among all nations.

It gives me a lively pleasure to see these ties constantly strengthened more and more. I have imparted my sentiments to Mr. Fox. I pray you to be my interpreter to Congress, and the American people whom it represents. Tell them how much I appreciate, and with me the whole of Russia, the testimonies of friendship they have given me, and how happy I will be to see the American nation grow in strength and prosperity by the union and constant practice of the civic virtues that distinguish it.

Accept, at the same time, the assurance of the high consideration with which I am your good friend.

ALEXANDER.

The message, with the accompanying document, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ATCHISON AND PIKE'S PEAK RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, in relation to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1866.

Mr. LOAN. I move that this message, with the accompanying report, be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the journal of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico for the session of 1865-66; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

PEACE IN SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas wars destructive of commerce and injurious and prejudicial to republican institutions have for some time been carried on between Spain and several of the South American States on the Pacific coast, and also between Paraguay and Brazil, Uruguay and the Argentine Republic on the Atlantic coast; Now, therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs inquire and report whether the friendly offices of the United States ought not to be used, if practicable, to promote peace and harmony in South America.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WARD, of New York, (having obtained unanimous consent to make a statement,) said: Mr. Speaker, I observe, on examining the New York papers of last Saturday, that my name is omitted from the list of members who voted upon the bill extending suffrage in the District of Columbia. I voted in favor of that bill.

I desire also to say that, on examining the index of the Globe for the last session, I find that all my acts and doings for that session are attributed to Elijah Ward, who was a distinguished member of the former Congress, but is not a member of this. I do not know that I can remedy this error except by making this statement to go upon the record, so that a very worthy gentleman may not be charged with things which he would not like to father.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and the same is hereby, directed to inquire into the propriety of consolidating the committees of the two Houses of Congress on public buildings and grounds into a joint committee.

JURIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to regulate the selection of juries for the several courts of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, when the vote was taken on Friday last on the bill concerning suffrage in the District of Columbia I was absent, not expecting that so important a measure would be passed on private bill day. I move that the rules be suspended so that all those who were then absent may have leave to record their votes on that question.

The motion was agreed to; and leave was granted accordingly.

HENRY MILLER.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee appointed to investigate the circumstances connected with the murder of certain Union soldiers in South Carolina be instructed also to investigate, under the powers already conferred upon them, and report without delay to this House all the facts connected with the confinement in the jail at Waterboro', South Carolina, of Henry Miller, under sentence of death, for the alleged crime of desertion from the rebel army and acting as a spy for General Sherman during the late war.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, as a reason for offering that resolution I communicate to this House certain information which I received in a letter from a highly respectable citizen of New York. I ask the letter to be read only so far as I have marked it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Jacob Miller, a German, residing in this town, a man of respectability, with whom I have been acquainted for several years, has a brother by the name of Henry Miller, who resided in South Carolina at the time the rebellion broke out, and as he did not wish to join the rebels he concealed himself to avoid being impressed, but was discovered and forced into their army. When General Sherman passed through, he deserted from them and joined the Union army; he informed General Sherman that in a certain place stores, ammunition, and horses were concealed. General Sherman detailed sixty men who were piloted by Miller to the place and the property was secured. Mr. Miller, together with his wife and children, were then sent forward by General Sherman at the expense of the Government to this town, where they remained until the war was over; his wife then returned to the South (she being a southern woman) to look after their affairs; he soon followed and commenced farming, whereby he earned a few hundred dollars. A short time since he was arrested as a deserter and a spy—he employed two lawyers to defend him, giving them all his money—was tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hung on the 4th of next month, and he now lies in the jail at Waterboro', South Carolina, awaiting his fate. So states the letter his brother received from him to-day, and he asks him to come and see him for the last time before he is executed."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put I desire to state it is due to the President of the United States I should say that on the receipt of that letter on Saturday, in the absence of the Secretary of War, I called upon the President, and at my suggestion he telegraphed to General Sickles to investigate the matter and report to him. I have received from the President this moment a telegram from General Sickles, in which he states he is investigating the matter; but I observe the man is indicted under the charge of highway robbery, so it seems this act of his has been transformed, so as to conform to the laws of South Carolina, into a charge of highway robbery. I deem it a matter of so great importance, although the President has caused investigation to be made, as that the committee charged with the investigation of a kindred matter should also investigate this and report to this House. I hope there will be no objection. I have had put into my hand a copy of a letter from Mr. Miller himself to General Sickles, substantially affirming the facts I have communicated to the House.

Mr. HALE. I suggest whether the language of the resolution should not be changed. It specifies that he now lies in jail on the charge of being a spy. It should be amended so as to add, "and on the pretense of highway robbery."

Mr. DAWES. I modify the resolution according to the gentleman's suggestion. I will say that the letter from which an extract was read is dated from Saugerties.

Mr. MAYNARD. If my friend from Massachusetts will allow a suggestion: I do not know that his resolution can be made any more extensive than it is, but I apprehend that this inquiry ought to go beyond this individual case. I am inclined to believe that this is merely a representative of a class of cases; that a great number of men, not only in South Carolina but in other parts of the South, who assisted our cause during the war have, since the termination of hostilities, been held amenable for civil offenses. One instance I will give. It will be recollected by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that I formerly had a colleague on this floor from the first district by the name of Nelson. A son of his, just at the close of the war, went upon a raid into North Carolina along with General Stoneman. While there in the discharge of his duties as a soldier he took the life of some party, for which since the war has ended I understand his person has been demanded by the Governor of North Carolina from the Governor of Tennessee. I see that the Legislature of North Carolina has recently passed a law condoning all such offenses whether committed by Federal or, as they express it, confederate forces. It is time that sort of thing should be stopped; that men who rendered assistance to the Union Army through the South under the orders of our officers should not be annoyed by prosecutions of this kind for civil offenses.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will specify any particular case, I will accept a modification of the resolution by giving the committee jurisdiction over it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Perhaps the gentleman will extend the scope of his resolution so as to authorize the committee to bring in any appropriate legislation.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose that is covered by the original authority. The resolution proposes that they investigate under the powers conferred upon them. I will accept any modification enlarging the scope of the resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that the committee be allowed any legislation that they may deem appropriate.

Mr. DAWES. I will add "with such recommendation as they may deem proper."

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

SOUTHERN WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States.

Mr. DELANO. Is it in order to put this bill on its passage?

The SPEAKER. It is, under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. DELANO. I then move the previous question.

Mr. LE BLOND. I reserve my right to object.

The bill was read. It enacts that the provisions, chapter 246, of the act of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, first session, approved July 4, 1864, shall not be construed to authorize the settlement of any claim for supplies or stores taken or furnished for the use of or used by the armies of the United States, nor for the occupation of or injury to real estate, nor for the consumption, appropriation, or destruction of or damage to personal property by the military authority or troops of the United States, where such claims originated during the war for the suppression of the rebellion in a State declared in insurrection by proclamation of the President of the United States, or in a State which by an ordinance of secession attempted to withdraw from the United States Government, provided that nothing herein contained shall repeal or modify the effect of the joint resolution of Congress passed July 23, 1866, extending the provisions of the said act of July 4, 1864, to the loyal citizens of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. LATHAM. I object to its consideration.

Mr. DELANO. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time.

Mr. DELANO. I demand the previous question on the third reading.

Mr. LATHAM. I suggest a modification to include the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, of West Virginia, which were added to that State by act of Congress at the last session.

Mr. DELANO. I cannot consent.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. DELANO. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LATHAM. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would be glad to hear from my colleague [Mr. DELANO] some reason for the passage of this bill at this time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The bill shows it. I object to any further debate.

The question was upon ordering the yeas and nays; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 21, noes 89; not one fifth voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. LATHAM called for tellers upon the question of ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LATHAM. I call for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by JOHN W. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had corrected the errors in the engrossment of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 876, making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, and now returned the same to the House for its concurrence.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1868; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the special order for Friday, the 4th of January next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I reserve the right to raise points of order on this bill when it shall come up for consideration.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, also reported a bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the special order for Friday, the 4th of January next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I reserve all points of order on this bill, when it shall come up for consideration.

INCREASED COMPENSATION OF CLERKS, ETC.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, the Committee on Appropriations were discharged from the further consideration of sundry petitions of the clerks and civil employés in the Executive Departments, for an increase of compensation, and the same were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE SCRIP.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the rules be suspended in order to enable me to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion.

The joint resolution was read for information. It directs that the further issue of agricultural college scrip to any of the States lately in rebellion shall be prohibited until they shall be fully restored to their rights as States by Congress.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 82, not voting, 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook Cullom, Dawes, DeFrees, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—72.

So the rules were suspended; and the joint resolution was introduced and read a first and second time.

The question being on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time;

Mr. JULIAN called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution, being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF LOYAL CITIZENS.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to protect loyal persons in the States lately in rebellion, including the States of Maryland, Missouri, and Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROTECTION OF FREEDMEN.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Whereas the following, purporting to be an official advertisement, appeared in the public prints of the day as copied from one of the newspapers of Maryland:

"Public Sale.—The undersigned will sell at the court-house door in the city of Annapolis at 12 o'clock m. on Saturday, 8th December, 1866, a negro man named Richard Harris, for six months, convicted at the October term, 1866, of the Anne Arundel circuit court for larceny, and sentenced by the court to be sold as a slave. Terms of sale, cash."

"WM. BRYAN,
"Sheriff Anne Arundel county."

"DECEMBER 3, 1866."
Therefore, resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether such conviction and order of sale occurred as stated in said advertisement; and if so, whether such proceeding is not in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States and with the act "to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication;" and that if in their opinion the Constitution and the act referred to have been violated, the committee further inquire whether any steps have been taken by the President of the United States to enforce the law and prevent such outrages; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to report to the House at any time what action they may deem necessary and proper for Congress to take on the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a single suggestion before the vote be taken on this resolution. I wish simply to suggest whether the inquiry proposed should not be enlarged. It will be recollected that in the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, it was provided, perhaps unfortunately, that there should be no slavery "except in punishment for crime of which the party should be duly convicted." Now, sir, Maryland is not the only State of the South that under the exception I have mentioned has taken occasion to pass laws providing for selling freedmen into slavery. It is not many weeks since two persons—a very respectable gentleman and his wife—called at my room to say that they had just come from Florida, the gentleman having been engaged in the revenue service there until it became too warm for them and they came away. They informed me that the day before they left they saw seven negroes sold into slavery at public auction, some of them for seven years; and that they saw several others whipped with stripes upon the naked back at the whipping-post under the discriminating laws of Florida.

Now, sir, there are laws all over the South which provide for taking up these people on charges of vagrancy and other things of that kind and selling them into bondage as actual as any that ever existed there, though not perhaps to the same extent. I think that while we are inquiring we had better enlarge the scope of the inquiry so as to extend it to all the southern States, all the former slave States. While on this subject I may say that Maryland, although near to the free States in geographical position, is more bitterly imbued with the old virus of slavery than any of the southern States that have been conquered.

A MEMBER. Except Kentucky.

Mr. STEVENS. No, I think that Maryland is worse even than Kentucky. Sir, in the State of Maryland one hundred thousand white men, in that portion of the State where the slave population formerly abounded, exercise equal political power with six hundred thousand in the free portion of the State. This being the case, there is in my judgment no such thing as a republican form of government there; and I hope that some gentleman from that State or some other member of this House will, before this Congress shall adjourn, present some proposition which will give to Maryland a republican form of government, apportion her representation upon the basis of population, and modify her laws so that men shall not be sold into slavery almost within sight of this Capitol. I have thought proper to make these remarks because I know how extensive this evil is.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, this resolution as I at first drew it had a wider scope and directed inquiry into all cases similar to that described in it; but on reflection it occurred to me that an investigation into this particular instance might be made by the Committee on the Judiciary without interfering with the performance of its other duties; while I was apprehensive that an attempt to impose on that committee or a select committee the duty of investigating such cases in all parts of the country might result in our having no report for a long time to come.

However, I am not by any means unfriendly to any such general investigation, and I think every one must have concluded in the present temper of the chief Executive of the United States we have no right to expect he will lend us any of the aid of that power vested in him to carry out the laws of the United States, to prevent inequality and oppression in relation to any particular class of citizens in those States lately in rebellion.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has given you one or two other instances in illustration. I happen to be in possession of the facts in another case which I will take occasion to present as showing little is to be hoped from that quarter. An old negro man, I think between seventy and eighty, a much-respected preacher of the Gospel, living in Georgia, was employed by a benevolent association at Philadelphia, as I believe, to act as superintendent of an asylum, home, or school in that State for colored people. He received a small pittance of salary amounting, I think, to $35 a month, which was much for him and quite sufficient for all his needs.

In order to wreak their vengeance upon northern philanthropy and to manifest their contempt and hatred for northern people and their benevolent movements, this old man was arrested on the charge of vagrancy, and it has been decided in a court in Georgia, and upon appeal, I think, to a superior court the decision affirmed, one receiving compensation of that kind from northern benevolence, though in the shape of fixed salary, yet for a negro, was a vagrant under their laws, a person without any visible means of support; and he has been condemned to the chain-gang for, I think, a term of twelve months, and is now working out that punishment. The matter has been sent to the Judge Advocate General of the United States, where I had the opportunity of knowing the official papers proving all these facts. Yet we seem to be powerless to enforce the civil rights bill so as to protect a man under these circumstances.

Mr. GRINNELL. Are you in favor of admitting Georgia at this time?

Mr. SCHENCK. Whenever Congress is ready, and she has complied with all proper conditions, I will admit her. I see her in no such condition now.

Mr. FINCK. I object to debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rule so that the resolution may be considered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Has not the resolution, being debated, gone over under the rules?

Mr. SPEAKER. It has not.

The motion was agreed to; and the rules were suspended.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have nothing further to add, and call for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution. At the same time if any gentleman will present a modification of the resolution making it broader in its scope, and that is thought advisable, I will withdraw the previous question for the moving of such an amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move the following amendment:

And said committee is also directed to report what legislation, if any, is necessary to protect loyal citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property in that portion of the States declared to be in rebellion.

In support of that I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the Loyal Georgian, of December 8, 1866, a paper published at Augusta, Georgia. Then I call for the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

"We have from week to week given accounts of the murder of freedmen, and have stated that in no instance have the murderers been punished. If white men are murdered by freedmen the murderers are sure to be punished. This is right. We hope that every colored man who is guilty of murder will be punished. The following is the account of the execution of a colored man:

"Execution.—Henry Cheatham, a negro, was executed at Anderson on Friday last in the presence of an immense crowd of whites and blacks.

"It will be remembered that Cheatham, in conjunction with Dan Johnson, brutally murdered a white youth, named Geer, near Anderson, last January. He confessed his guilt."—Columbia South Carolinian.

"At the late equal rights convention, held in Macon, the delegates representing some fifty counties, reported one hundred and fifty murders within the last twelve months, and in no instance did the civil authorities attempt to bring the murderers to justice.

"One woman was found with her throat cut from ear to ear, and her little child, less than a year old, eating the clotted blood from the wound. Another woman, in a delicate condition, was beat to death and the child beat out of her.

"We know that these murders are committed by villains, white villains, but they are no better than colored murderers. The latter are punished, the former are not."

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal to my colleague to make an exception in that amendment, for the reason, as I understood the reading of it, that it includes an organized State now represented on this floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will modify it by excepting the State of Tennessee.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. LAWRENCE was agreed to.

The original resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee to consist of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker whose duty it shall be to inquire whether any acts have been done by any officer of the Government of the United States which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors, and whether said acts were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the Government of the United States, or any department thereof, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oath to witnesses, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would ask my colleague whether it is not usual in resolutions of this sort, giving such extraordinary powers, to name the specific thing, or at least something that justifies the action of the House. The resolution as it stands embraces every civil officer in the United States, and I suggest whether it is altogether wise in a resolution of this kind to notify the world that there is a grand inquest about to be held on all the officers of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. There is no subject before the House for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is, "Shall the rules be suspended?"

Mr. FINCK. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on suspending the rules, it was decided in the negative—yeas 88, nays 49, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—54.

So two thirds not having voted in the affirmative the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call,

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER stated that his colleague, Mr. DAWSON, had paired with Mr. BROOMALL.

MURDER OF UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed on the 6th instant to investigate the murder of Union soldiers, &c., be authorized at their discretion to proceed to South Carolina to make the investigation directed by the House, and that they have authority to employ a stenographer as clerk, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to pay the expenses of the investigation out of the contingent fund of the House.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of House bill No. 664, for the regulation of appointments to and removals from office. When the bill was last under consideration it was ordered to be printed with the pending amendments.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is an amendment to the bill offered by myself and now pending. I desire to withdraw that amendment as the action of the House in striking out that portion of the bill relating to the heads of Departments renders it unnecessary.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. PAINE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] to withdraw his call for the regular order to enable me to offer a resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw the call.

DIRECT TAXES IN REBEL STATES.

Mr. PAINE. I move to suspend the rules in order that I may introduce a resolution for the appointment of a select committee, and I will state to the House that it will be impossible for me to serve in any capacity upon the committee should it be ordered. The resolution I desire to offer is as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the laws of Congress enacted since the commencement of the late rebellion, providing for the assessment and collection of direct taxes in the late rebel States and for the seizure and sale of forfeited and abandoned lands and other property therein, have been faithfully executed, and to report to this House the results of their investigation, with the evidence taken thereon; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer as clerk; to hold their sessions at Washington and such other places as shall in their judgment be most convenient for the performance of their duties; that one of the assistants of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be ordered to accompany said committee; and that the expenses of said committee be defrayed out of the contingent funds of this House.

Mr. BOYER. I ask for the yeas and nays on suspending the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 28, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Beaman, Blaine, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Donnelly, Dumont, Eekley, Eggleston, Eliot, Goodyear, Griswold, Harris, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hise, Asahel W. Washburn, Winfield, and Wright—59.

So two thirds having voted in the affirmative the rules were suspended.

Mr. PAINE. I now offer the resolution I have read, and upon it I call the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Does the resolution provide for the appointment of a stenographer and a clerk?

Mr. PAINE. No sir; of a stenographer as clerk.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PEACE IN SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas wars destructive of commerce and injurious and prejudicial to republican institutions have for some time been carried on between Spain and several of the South American States on the Pacific coast, and also between Paraguay and Brazil, Uruguay and the Argentine Republic, on the Atlantic coast: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That it be, and is hereby, recommended to the executive department of the Government that the friendly offices of this Government, if practicable, be offered for the promotion of peace and harmony in South America.

REVOLUTION IN CANDIA.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if deemed compatible with the public interest, a copy of any official correspondence which may have taken place relative to the revolution now in progress in the island of Candia, a possession of the Ottoman Porte.

REPRESENTATION OF GEORGIA.

Mr. ROGERS presented the credentials of E. G. Cabannis, claiming a seat as a Representative from the fourth district of Georgia; which were referred under the rule to the joint committee on reconstruction.

DAMAGES FROM MORGAN'S RAID.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House whether any claims have been presented to the quartermaster of the United States by citizens of the State of Indiana, for horses or other property seized or received by the Government of the United States during the raid of John Morgan through said State in the month of July, 1863, for the purpose of suppressing said raid and for the pursuit and capture of said Morgan; what number of horses were there seized, and what amount in value of other property for which such claims have been made; whether such claims have been paid, and if not, why not.

A. P. FAUST.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be requested to inquire into the expediency of granting to A. P. Faust the pension claimed by him as per his memorial and papers on file in the Clerk's office.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and proceed to the consideration of the President's annual message.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WELKER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. HISE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HISE. Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss that portion of the President's message which has relation to the question of depriving ten States that passed ordinances of secession of their right to representation in this House and in the Senate of the United States. I propose, in the first place, to treat the subject as a constitutional question. I propose, next, to discuss the question as one of expediency; and in the last place, I desire to make an appeal to the justice and generosity of the House.

This question necessarily involves a consideration of the nature and the powers of the Government created by the Constitution of the United States. That the Government of the United States has no valid authority or existence except by virtue of the Constitution of the United States as ratified by the respective States is a proposition in reference to which, I believe, there is no difference of opinion. The Government in its legislative and every other department acts solely under the authority of the Constitution, deriving from that instrument all the power which it can rightfully exercise. On this question, I imagine, there is no division of sentiment among the members of this House.

The next inquiry, then, which arises is with reference to the nature of the Government thus constituted and the extent of its powers. Upon this question there have been from the very origin of the Government two political schools, one taking the ground that the Constitution was ordained by the people of the United States in their collective capacity as one sovereign political community; that thus was created a national Government with paramount and supreme authority in all cases in which it may assume jurisdiction, and that the States are mere subordinate sub-divisions of one sovereign nation and have individually no attribute of sovereignty. The other school, to which I belong and have ever belonged, holds that the Union created by the Constitution is merely a commonwealth of independent sovereign States; that the Constitution is an emanation of State authority, having been ordained by sovereign and independent States; each acting in its separate, sovereign capacity; that all governmental power resided with the original thirteen States as independent sovereignties; that when the dominion of the British Crown had been thrown off each State became invested with the powers of an independent nation; that each State separately became endowed, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, with "full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

Those thirteen States had all the characteristics of independent States. Each State was perfectly independent in its political organization. Each had its Governor, its Legislature, its judges, among whom were distributed all the necessary functions and powers of government. Between the period of the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, an interval of two years, each State was not only sovereign and independent, but perfect in its distinct political organization and unrestricted in the exercise of governmental power.

Those States were, even as colonies, independent each of the others. Each had its separate charter and exercised its separate jurisdiction. The acts of each of the colonial governments were limited in force and validity to the respective boundaries of each colony. I now remember no binding connection of any sort existing between those Colonies prior to the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, except that previous to the Declaration of Independence they were under a common executive head, the Crown of Great Britain.

The thirteen original States, as independent sovereign communities, entered into that treaty embodied in the Articles of Confederation, which, by its own language was denominated "a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense whatever." It was not the purpose of that compact or alliance to consolidate those States under one common government. Nor did the States in adopting those Articles of Confederation surrender any portion of their sovereignty or independence. It was expressly declared that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence."

The war of the Revolution closed, and the States, the independent, sovereign States, upon the advice of wise and able men still continued their connection for the same grand purpose of protection and defense against foreign aggression; and they did adopt and make binding for all time to come the Constitution of the United States as it now appears, with some amendments adopted since.

And the ground I now plant myself upon impenetrably is that the Constitution creates merely a commonwealth of States which previously to that time were sovereign and independent to all intents and purposes. It is likewise manifestly true from an examination of the document itself, as well as from contemporaneous political history, that all these States consented by that Constitution, if you call it such, or, in other words by a compact between sovereignties, consented to part with a number of the powers of government, to grant them with all the functionaries, legislative, executive, and judicial, provided for in the Constitution of the United States. Now, in order to maintain the independence they had achieved, in order to provide for the common defense in the event of foreign aggression, in order that they should declare war and make peace as well as maintain peace in the States, they parted with certain powers for that protection and defense. They retained, of course, the balance. They became the grantors of certain powers to the Government, and they surrendered none others.

The very nature of the powers granted, as well as the very nature of the powers of government inhibited to the Government, shows the grand objects and purposes of the Constitution. One of these was to protect these States in their foreign affairs, as shown by the power to declare war and to make peace, and as shown by the power contained in that Constitution to regulate foreign commerce and commerce between the States. Another object was to preserve peace between the States, and hence the jurisdiction of the United States was extended to all suits pending between two or more of the States.

It was therefore a commonwealth of States, every State retaining by express provision, though such express provision was not necessary for the purpose, all powers of government they did not grant away. Here, then, is the charter. They were sovereign and independent, with powers of government without limit except as limited by their own constitutions. Hence the Constitution of the United States is a charter; it is a grant in which the States were grantors, and the functions of government not provided for in that charter were reserved to themselves. When you look to understand the powers granted and the powers reserved you must consider and understand that the Government of the United States is a State creation and its functionaries occupy the position of grantees; that they receive all the power they possess, all the jurisdiction they have by charter and grant in the Constitution of the United States, accorded to them by the agreement of the thirteen original States.

That being the case, we must look into the Constitution to see the nature and character of these grants, and the character of the Government created by them. I pronounce it to be a commonwealth of States. Now, without any provision in the Constitution of the United States itself that all the powers not granted or necessary to those granted are reserved to the States and people respectively, that would have necessarily followed without any provision in the Constitution from the fact that the States created the Government, that the States granted all the powers which it possesses, and that necessarily all the other powers of government are reserved. In other words, I look upon the Constitution of the United States as a treaty between independent States by which every State became a contractor with all the other States that all the enumerated powers should be surrendered up to a Government to be constituted as provided for in that charter.

Now, sir, if that is the view, and the reasonable view, fortified by examination of the document itself and fortified by the political history of the country, then it is necessarily a Government representative in its form. The functionaries created by that Government are legislative, executive, and judicial, according to that charter from these States. They are to be appointed in a given mode prescribed in that Constitution, and they cannot be appointed in any other. The legislative department is to be made up of two representatives from each State to the United States Senate, and of a certain number of Representatives fixed in the Constitution from each one of the thirteen States ratifying the Constitution. It also provides how the number shall afterward be fixed, and that no State shall ever have less than one Representative.

This Government can be wielded and controlled, laws can be made by it for the purpose of carrying into execution the powers granted to the legislative branch only by and through the instrumentalities provided in the Constitution. Each State agreed that every other State should be represented in the lower branch of Congress in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, by a given number, until an apportionment should take place according to a census of the population, and after that by a given ratio. This is a Government of States, to be conducted in its executive, legislative, and judicial branches in a given mode, and no State can be controlled or governed legitimately under the Constitution that has not its due representation upon the floor of this House and its equal representation upon the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In view of the statement just expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky, I ask him whether, in his opinion, our legislation during the rebellion, while the southern States were unrepresented in Congress, was illegal and is void.

Mr. HISE. If the gentleman will hear me through I will come to that. Do not be impatient, if you please.

Mr. MYERS. I hope I shall have a reply.

Mr. HISE. I will answer the gentleman's question. It is provided in the Constitution of the United States that a majority of all the Representatives is required for the transaction of business. A majority of all the Representatives means a majority of all the Representatives from every State of the Union, whether in a state of war or of peace.

But the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House at this period of my remarks is this: that there is no provision in the Constitution for the government of a Territory. There is no authority in the Constitution for the Congress of the United States by and through its agencies, legislative, executive, or judicial, to govern any community or body of people except they be States. States adopted the Constitution, States furnished the Representatives, States provided for and appointed agencies, and the extent of the authority of those agencies is what the States have made it.

I well remember that President Lincoln in one of his messages or inaugurals—I do not at this moment remember which—boldly assumed the ground that there never were States out of the Union existing on this continent; that the Government of the United States was paramount and supreme to all intents and purposes, only by restraint where majorities could not be maintained. In other words, that it was a popular Government, a Government of the majority, and that only majorities in the legislative branch had a right to pass laws of any description to which the minority of the people or of the States were bound to submit. The clear implication of that message or inaugural was that there never had existed sovereign and independent States outside of the Union.

Now, I will acknowledge that before the Articles of Confederation there were several attempts among the Colonies to protect themselves against war with the Indian tribes by an aggregation of their powers. A portion of the country was colonized by the Dutch and there were attempts at alliance between the Colonies, but they never succeeded in establishing any connection between them of a governmental character.

You cannot govern Territories. If you do you usurp power without constitutional authority. There is no authority in the Constitution to govern Territories. This is a Government of States in which all the States are represented. The States choose the legislative and the President, and the President appoints judicial officers, and yet you exclude, and it is proposed to keep out, ten of the States from representation in Congress right in the teeth of a positive injunction in the Constitution itself that every State of the Union shall be represented according to a certain ratio of inhabitants, and that it shall have equal representation in the United States Senate.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HISE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the territorial governments established under the administration of Washington were constitutional or not?

Mr. HISE. I will come to that. I admit that from the very origin of the Government up to the present period Congress has assumed, in my opinion usurped originally, the authority to establish political institutions and governments for people living outside of the States of this Union, for people who did not live within any of the States; for people who, it may be very true, settled upon the public domain, upon the land belonging to the Government of the United States.

Now, I hold that this Government is essentially and necessarily a representative Government. The Constitution is its charter; in it are set forth the powers which are to be exercised by the appointees of the States and by the States alone. Those governmental powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, must be exercised by State authority and by State agents under the charter that limits the powers and defines the extent of the authority. Now, I admit that in progress of time, by repeated precedents, this thing of instituting political governments and institutions for people who have settled on the public domain has become unquestioned. No public man now questions it much, whatever may be his opinion in regard to the power under the Constitution of the United States to do so. The power has been usurped, and successive usurpations have grown into precedents, so that now there is an acquiescence upon the part of the people of the United States, and perhaps also on the part of the people who are living on the public domain. But acquiescence does not create the power or justify its exercise. The Constitution gives no authority for any government of person or persons, community or communities, outside of the States that compose the Commonwealth of this nation.

I know that as authority for the exercise of this power over Territories we have been frequently referred to that clause of the Constitution which provides that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Now, I hold that if the members of the Convention which framed the Constitution, or any of the conventions of the States which ratified it, had believed for a moment that that clause included the power of instituting political governments over people outside of the States, people who are not citizens of the States, they would have provided for the representation of those Territories upon this floor. This Government can be carried on only through the instrumentality of representation. It was because there was an attempt on the part of Great Britain to govern the original Colonies by enactments of Parliament in which they had no representation that led to the struggle which resulted in the establishment of our independence and the creation of our representative form of government.

It is most astonishing that the time should ever arrive when the functionaries of these State governments on this floor should set up by usurpation, as I deem it, their own authority and power to govern those States which are not allowed a voice upon this floor; ten States which have been excluded by your enactments from any representation here, and that, too, in violation of the very principle of government existing in all our fundamental charters of government, State and Federal, of the very principle upon which the Colonies with but three million people hazarded a war with Great Britain. It is astonishing that by any lapse of time these old revolutionary recollections and the devotion and love of the people for representative government, should be forgotten, and the time should arrive when party domination, actuated and impelled by party malevolence and fierceness or party rapacity, should attempt to set aside all the principles of government and to govern these people in all respects by measures and institutions which appear to me—I speak it with all due deference to the majority on this floor—to be malevolent and malignant in the last degree.

As I have already said, I admit that territorial governments have been imposed upon people living upon the public domain, and many public men have attempted to derive the authority for establishing those governments from the clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to do no more than preserve or dispose of the public property; "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." That is a provision giving power to Congress to dispose of or preserve the public property; nothing more.

Why, sir, several of the States of this Union ceded large tracts of territory to the Government of the United States before the adoption of the Constitution. People flocked upon that territory and occupied those lands. The Congress of the United States assumed, no doubt under this clause of the Constitution, the authority to institute political governments for such territory. But, sir, I say that if there had been any intention upon the part of the framers of the Constitution to authorize by this clause the institution of territorial governments by the Congress of the United States, the Constitution, which evinces in every part the devotion of its framers to the principles of republican government, would have provided that the Territories thus constituted should be represented in the Legislature of the Union. The absence of such a provision indicates clearly to my mind that the exercise of this congressional control over the Territories was never contemplated by the men who constructed the great charter of our political government.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a brief question?

Mr. HISE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the Congress by which those first territorial governments were instituted was not to a large extent composed of gentlemen who had participated in the action of the Convention that framed the Constitution; and whether Thomas Jefferson, the founder and the head of the States' Rights Democratic party, did not, instead of opposing the congressional government of the Territories as unconstitutional, submit the most important amendment perhaps that ever was made to any of those territorial acts, the provision excluding slavery from the territory northwest of the river Ohio, thereby indorsing those territorial governments as, in his judgment, constitutional?

Mr. HISE. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be drawn off at present into a discussion of the subject of slavery. I will say, however, that I cannot at present remember (for it is years since I examined the record, if I ever examined it) how the yeas and nays were made up upon the first proposition to institute under the authority of Congress political governments for the Territories.

Mr. FINCK. I would suggest to my friend from Kentucky, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that the amendment proposed by Mr. Jefferson was prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is correct as to that particular proposition; but that does not affect the other portion of my question touching the establishment of territorial governments by Congress.

Mr. HISE. The compact between the Congress of the United States and the State of Virginia in relation to the cession of the territory northwest of the river Ohio—I speak from my present recollection and I have not examined the subject for some years—provided, not that Congress should organize Territories and institute territorial governments with no representation of those communities in Congress, but that the territory ceded should be formed into "not less than three, nor more than five States," which should be admitted into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever." I do not recollect that that ordinance of 1787 contained any provision for the institution of territorial governments by Congress over the people who might go upon those lands and inhabit them. I acknowledge that the Congress of the United States had authority, under that clause of the Constitution to which I have referred, to provide for surveying those lands and bringing them into market and to specify the terms upon which they might be occupied and settled. All this may have been done; but the exercise of governmental power over people unrepresented is a thing foreign to our whole system of government, Federal and State.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISE. If I yield, I hope the House will indulge me by setting aside the hour rule so as to enable me to conclude my remarks.

Mr. WENTWORTH and others. Certainly, we will do that.

Mr. HISE. Then I yield to the gentleman with great pleasure.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman without his cordial consent. The question I was about to propose was, whether the gentleman from Kentucky assimilates the condition of the ten States now unrepresented in Congress to that of territory belonging to the Government that has never been organized into States.

Mr. HISE. I will consider that point when I come more directly to the question of representation.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well, sir. I was going to make that the foundation of another question, but I will not press it.

Mr. HISE. Mr. Speaker, in the course of policy indicated by all the atrocious and monstrous measures which have been brought forward here, the dominant majority in this body have indicated a deep-seated consciousness that there can be no State in the Union without its representatives in Congress; that there can be no State unless that State has its proportionate share of representation on this floor. Hence, while the majority in this Congress exclude from representation ten States, comprising a population of twelve or fifteen millions, they at the same time propose to institute over those States a most oppressive government, to justify which they must maintain, as they do, that those States are out of the Union, that they are not States of the Union.

If they are not States in the Union, then I do not think you can govern them at all. You have no right to do it. If they are kept out of the Union by any means whatever, then I deny the authority of the States in the Union under this Constitution of Government to govern them at all. They would have the same ground now, at least of remonstrance, protest, and resistance, that we had when we declared our independence at the risk of a bloody struggle with the enormous power of the Government of Great Britain. You deny them now representation upon this floor, which was then denied to our fathers by the British Government. Did it justify our forefathers, the people who inhabited these thirteen British colonies, in shaking off British domination, coming from under the British yoke, and making that war with Great Britain—you may call it revolution, then it was—did it justify them upon the ground of right and principle? Where now is the American citizen who will not say the Declaration of Independence was not justified, that the union of the colonists to establish that independence was not justified and rightful in itself?

These gentlemen are mighty sticklers for the Declaration of Independence and the principles therein contained; and that Declaration contains the principle in substance that the people have the right to alter, remodel, and abolish their institutions of government at discretion, and that whenever in the progress of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, but a decent respect for the opinion of mankind would seem to require they should make a declaration of the causes that led them to that point. So we did in reference to Great Britain. We made a declaration of the causes which led to the Revolution, and one of the main causes was that these Colonies had been denied all representation.

It is true that Government was oppressive. It is true our people were taken abroad and tried in British courts. It is true American commerce was taxed by acts of the British Parliament. They rose up against the oppressive government that was attempted to be riveted upon them by the British Government. Oppressive government, misrule, and revolution will follow every people who are denied representation in the body that attempts to govern them. Witness what we are doing, witness what we have done, and then see whether or not the principle of representation being abandoned or surrendered or taken away the rule still held over the people unrepresented will not result in unjust, sectional, oppressive, and arbitrary governments.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman has substantially answered the question I propounded a few moments ago, and which was preliminary to another, namely, whether, in case any State becomes deprived of all State government, all civil government, it can have any representation in Congress until that civil government is restored and reestablished? In other words, is not the existence of a valid State government the foundation of all right of representation in this body?

Mr. HISE. I will come to that, sir, directly. Suppose it to be yielded and conceded for argument's sake that the Congress of the United States, this Government of States, can adopt and impose political institutions and governments over people not being a State and community, over a people who never have been received or admitted as States into the Union; suppose it to be conceded although it is in violation of the grand doctrine at the very foundation of our system of government, to wit, representation, it does not follow you can adopt political government and institutions for people who have never lived upon your territory, who never occupied any portion of your public domain; a right of government that cannot be inferred from that provision of the Constitution that Congress shall make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States. Instead of holding any portion of lands within the borders of the Colonies at the publication of the Articles of Confederation which preceded and produced the Union of these States, the United States Government had not a foot of land I know of in North America. Cessions were afterward made. When the Constitution was adopted there were lands ceded by some of the States. The States not only granted the great charter of your Government, not only created the Constitution, but some of them gave you their lands. The States were the grantors of lands as well as the grantors of powers. Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia made cessions of large tracts of unappropriated or unsettled domain to the Government of the United States, which lands have been used and enjoyed, have been disposed of and used for public emolument and benefit in every way, and now you deny representation on this floor to these very States. Virginia by her Barber and Madison; South Carolina by her Pinckney, Butler, and Rutledge; Georgia by her Few and Baldwin; some of the ablest and most illustrious men of the age in which they lived, minds that have not been excelled since, if they have been equaled, were the authors and projectors of your great charter, the Constitution of the United States; and now after those States have given you their lands you thrust them outside the Union and attempt to govern them as territories, and in order that your oppressive rule may be maintained over them without opposition or hindrance you deny them representation in Congress. What monstrous injustice; what gross violation of all the doctrines and principles which pertain to free government in any country!

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman having answered that question, if he will allow me, I will propound a third.

Mr. HISE. I do not wish to be drawn off by answering the gentleman's questions. Suppose you can govern people on the public domain. All the public domain that was ceded to the Government of the United States by Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia has been peopled and received into the Union of the States under the authority of the provisions of the Constitution. Their land has been taken up, occupied, and formed into communities and those communities have been received into the Union; and now before the Government is ninety years old, you turn around and deny these people, who through their Representatives in the Federal Convention were the authors of the Constitution itself, their just representation, and at the same time you are continually discriminating against them and in favor of the North in all your legislation. Is it just? Is it constitutional?

You never owned the territory out of which those States were formed—I mean Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia. It is true the lands northwest of the Ohio formerly owned by Virginia were ceded to you by that State, and five States have since been formed out of it and admitted into the Union, and these very States have here a representation which, in connection with the rest of the northern States, are denying to their mother—"the mother of States as well as of statesmen"—her just representation upon this floor, and are controlling her by the most oppressive legislation.

Sir, you have no foundation upon which to rest in instituting territorial governments over these people. You never had title to these lands. You had title to the lands out of which certain other States were formed. Florida was ceded to the United States by Spain. Louisiana was ceded to the United States by France. You governed them as Territories before they were admitted into the Union as States. You instituted governments, it is true, for other Territories, but never in a case where you did not own the land can you rightfully institute territorial governments over the people. Where is the authority to convert these States into Territories? Because that is your purpose, and in carrying out that purpose you betray the consciousness that as States they should be represented.

You say they are not States of the Union. I say they are. It is an axiomatic truth. It can easily be denied, and it is difficult to prove it. It is proven by the very statement of the case. I say that they are States, and to deny them representation as such in the Senate and House of Representatives is to deprive them of their constitutional rights. And in doing so the House and Senate are continually amenable to the charge of grossly violating the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISE. Certainly.

Mr. DRIGGS. Does the gentleman hold that they were States three years ago?

Mr. HISE. Yes, sir, I do. I hold that "once a State always a State." And here I do not mean to be misunderstood. I have always and under all circumstances been opposed to any attempt upon the part of any portion of the States to sever their connection with the other States. I have always insisted that such an attempt was wrong in theory and most inexpedient and injudicious in practice. Instead of ever favoring the severance of the States I have been, from the very earliest period of my political existence, ever since I had any knowledge of the character and framework of our institutions and Government, opposed to any severance of the States. I have looked forward hopefully to the period when this Government, qualified and limited as it is, with all its guarantees and rights, should be extended over the whole continent of North America, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic ocean, from the Atlantic to the Pacific; when the whole continent, divided into States, would be members of our Confederacy and all united together.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. HISE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I would ask the gentleman if he thinks that during the rebellion, say at the time of the battle of Stone River, Virginia, for instance, was entitled to representation here?

Mr. HISE. I will tell the gentleman what I think of the right of representation of States that were in insurrection or rebellion. Or rather not the States, because the idea of a State rebelling, a State committing treason or being guilty of an offense and subject to indictment, prosecution, trial, and punishment, is an absurdity. You cannot look upon the condition of things that existed in this country during the war in any other light than that there were bodies of armed men in those States which for the time being controlled them. But they did not destroy the existence of the States; they did not destroy their political governmental organizations as States; but for the time being the interposition of force prevented the extension of the authority of the Government over them, and their power of availing themselves of their right to be represented in Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. THAYER obtained the floor.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] will yield to allow me to move that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] be extended?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I then make that motion, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

No objection was made.

Mr. HISE. I thank the committee for the courtesy it has extended to me. I have no experience as a legislator; I have never served in Congress before; I have been sent here very much against my own inclination. While absent from my district I was presented to the people as a candidate to succeed Hon. Mr. Grider, my predecessor, and much against my desire I was elected. Being therefore a new member, although an old man, I ask the indulgence of the committee to go on—not now—and conclude my remarks. I do not expect ever to be here again, therefore I want to be heard, and I know that I shall have no other opportunity except in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I will move that the committee rise, and the gentleman can have the floor when the committee shall sit again.

Mr. HISE. I am obliged to the gentleman, and will yield for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELKER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the President's annual message had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. McRUER asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. HIGBY, for the remainder of this week.

Mr. BERGEN asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. GOODYEAR, until the 15th of January next.

NEW ORLEANS RIOTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a telegram from Mr. McCULLOUGH, appointed to fill a vacancy upon the select committee to investigate the riots in New Orleans, stating that he will be unable to go. If no objection be made he will be considered as excused, and the Chair will appoint to fill the vacancy Mr. CHARLES DENISON, of Pennsylvania.

No objection was made.

And then, on motion of Mr. HENDERSON, (at four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 18, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS O. LINCOLN, of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. BUCKALEW to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Claims occasioned by the vote of the Senate excusing Mr. SHERMAN from further service upon that committee.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg leave to present the credentials of Mr. JOHN T. JONES, elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Arkansas to fill the vacancy in the Senate from that State in the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1865. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a paper in the nature of a petition from the Union League of Norfolk, in Virginia, prepared in grand council. In this paper they solemnly protest against the "my policy" of the accidental President of the United States, the evils of which they say are too numerous and cannot be longer endured by the supporters of the Government. They protest against universal amnesty in exchange for universal suffrage, and against the enfranchisement of any but loyal Union voters. They conclude as follows:

"We earnestly pray Congress to ignore the present State and municipal governments of Virginia, and establish instead a territorial government, and we respectfully recommend Hon. Judge J. C. Underwood as Governor for your consideration."

This is signed by the officers of the Union League, the president, vice president, secretary, &c. I move that the paper be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am requested to present a petition from Louis Schade, Joseph Shillington, and about forty others, naturalized citizens or persons who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who, after reciting the fact of the recent passage of the bill relating to suffrage in the District of Columbia, state that "the Caucasian immigrant, whose intellect, industry, and wealth have contributed so much to the unparalleled progress of this country, is just as good, enlightened, and deserving of political privileges as the African just emerged from a state of slavery;" and also that "the Caucasian immigrant, though white, is a man, possessed of manhood, and consequently entitled to manhood suffrage." They pray that the act referred to may be amended in such manner as to put all whites of the Caucasian race who are either citizens or have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States on an equal footing with the negroes, and extend to them the same rights and privileges enjoyed by the latter. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. I present the petition of Charity Harlow, of Cornish, New Hampshire, the widow of a revolutionary soldier, a pensioner, praying that her pension of $44 22 may be increased to $96 per annum. She represents that she is ninety-eight years of age, entirely destitute of property, and unless this increase be made she must go to the almshouse. I move its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Charles O'Connor, William M. Everts, and others, members of the New York bar, praying for an increase of the salary of the United States judge for the southern district of New York; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I present a protest signed by Mrs. U. S. Grant, Mrs. Captain C. V. Morris, Mrs. General O. O. Howard, Mrs. Secretary Welles, and several other ladies, directors and managers of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home, protesting against the bill that passed the House of Representatives a day or two ago establishing a new board of directors for that institution. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have received from M. A. Southworth, Boyd Robinson, A. F. Miller, John Devonshire, Simon Jones, and Jacob Hawkins, a committee appointed by the influential loyal voters of Louisiana for that purpose, a memorial, which is accompanied by a letter signed by Jacob Hawkins, the chairman of a meeting held by loyal citizens of Louisiana, and charged with the duty of stating the history and objects of the memorial. With the leave of the Senate, I will read a portion of this letter of Mr. Hawkins. He states:

"About seventy copies, in possession of as many gentlemen, have been scattered over the State for signatures, and the names thus obtained have all been attached to this document. It has been presented to nearly all of our more influential loyal citizens and about one third of them have signed it, the others being deterred from doing so by regard for their personal interests or personal safety. The memorial has not been presented to our colored citizens for their signatures, as it was deemed best that it should be signed mainly by representative men. I respectfully state that it is the strong conviction of your memorialists that, in order that the action prayed for may be peaceably and effectually consummated, Congress should act immediately in this matter."

This petition is signed by J. Madison Wells, the Governor of the State of Louisiana, W. B. Hyman, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, R. K. Howell, Associate Justice, and very many others, embracing, as is stated in the letter of Mr. Hawkins, about one third of the more influential and representative men who are loyal in the State of Louisiana. The petition sets out that the present political organizations in Louisiana are not republican, because a majority of the citizens of that State are disfranchised and because they do not give adequate and equal protection to all the citizens; and the petitioners allege that these organizations are not loyal, "because they are controlled by those who were engaged in and now sympathize with the rebellion against the Government."

"We respectfully represent (say the petitioners) that a large majority of the voters of the State regret the failure of the late rebellion, and now openly approve and advocate the principles and feelings that produced it; that the principles and persons of those who remained loyal are as odious to them now as during the war, and that those who assisted the General Government in its victorious contest are now in the condition of a vanquished party; that the murders and persecutions of loyal men are increasing in frequency and turpitude, and that the lives, liberty, and property of the freedmen are mainly dependent upon the interests and caprices of the disloyal; and that neither we nor they can obtain justice in the civil courts or adequate military protection."

They further say:

"We therefore respectfully, but most earnestly, petition your honorable bodies to take such action as will supersede the present political organizations in our State by such as will be loyal to the General Government, and secure to the loyal people of Louisiana protection in their lives, liberty, and property."

The source from which this memorial emanates, the important questions which it treats, and the high character of the gentlemen who have signed it, will excuse me, I trust, for occupying the attention of the Senate for a few moments before I shall move its reference to a committee. If it be true, as alleged in this memorial, that the loyal men of the State of Louisiana are in the condition of a vanquished party; if their lives and liberty and property are not safe under the political organizations that exist, and which are in the hands of disloyal men, (and that these allegations are true, the gentlemen who make them have the best means of knowing,) it seems to me it is our duty to take some action in regard to the existing state of things in the State of Louisiana. I know we have proposed a constitutional amendment for the ratification of the States in the Union, and if it should be held that the ratification of that amendment by three fourths of the governing States made it valid, that would not remedy the existing evils in the State of Louisiana, or any other of the rebellious States where a similar condition of things exists. Something more would be necessary. It would be necessary to enter those States and hurl from power the disloyal element which controls and governs them. Need we wait for the ratification of the constitutional amendment to do that? In my judgment we need not. I think Congress has complete control over the whole subject. Under the Constitution it is incumbent on Congress to see that there is guaranteed to each State in the Union a republican form of government. This duty devolves upon us and nobody else. The Constitution says:

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

What power is vested in the Government of the United States? Another clause of this instrument says:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

What department of this Government is charged with the duty of carrying that power into effect? By the terms of the instrument it is the Congress of the United States and none other. And even if the power were vested in the Executive, which it is not, it would be the duty then of Congress to pass the necessary laws for his carrying it into effect. But, sir, it is not simply under this clause of the Constitution that the Congress has complete jurisdiction over this whole subject; there are other clauses. The Constitution declares that the Congress of the United States shall have power "to declare war" and "make rules concerning captures on land and water," "to define and punish offenses against the law of nations." And what was this rebellion but an offense against the law of nations? "To raise and support armies and make rules for their government and regulation;" and also by force of arms to put down insurrection under these war powers, vested by express terms of the Constitution itself in the Congress of the United States. Congress has complete jurisdiction over this whole subject, and the rebellious States and the people of those States are in the condition of any other people who have wickedly and causelessly undertaken to rebel against a good and just Government and failed in the undertaking.

What, sir, is the condition of the people in these rebellious States? How came they in the condition they are in? They undertook, not as individuals but as States, through their State organizations, to disrupt this Government and set up a government independent of the Government of the United States and in hostility to it. They overthrew the State governments which were in existence, which constituted the only link between them as States and the Federal Government. There is no other way by which a State, as such, has any connection with the Federal Government, except through a State organization; and the Federal Government has no connection with a State, either in its representation or in any other way, except through a State organization in harmony with the Federal Government. These rebellious States, Louisiana among them, succeeded in destroying those State organizations; they thereby broke the link which bound them as States to this Union. They were no longer States of the Union, having the rights and the privileges of States of the Union. They were still communities and States, if you please, within the jurisdiction of the Union. The laws of the Union operated over the people of the rebellious States just as completely during the rebellion as before or since. Every law of a general character extended over the people of the rebellious States just as much as over those of the loyal States.

It is true that for a time the Federal Government did not have means of enforcing its laws; but every citizen in those States was amenable to the law. It is true in every case where any citizen violates the law that the Government has not the means of preventing its violation; if it had no crime would ever be committed? The law forbids murder and theft and robbery and arson; but thefts and robberies and burnings take place in violation of the law. Sir, the law forbade this rebellion; it was not powerful enough to prevent it, and the Government of the United States for a time was not able to enforce its laws within the limits of the rebellious States; but every citizen of those States was amenable to the law whenever the Government was in a position to enforce its authority.

This, sir, in my judgment, was the condition of these rebellious States. The people of those States succeeded in destroying their loyal State organizations, they set up State organizations in hostility to the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States, as was its duty, overturned and extinguished these disloyal State organizations. What then was the condition of the rebel States? Were the old State governments revived? By no means. There was not, and had not been for years, a single officer under those old State governments, neither Governor nor judges nor Legislatures nor executive officers of any description; there was not an officer in one of those States holding his office under the State governments which the rebels overthrew. We ourselves, by the power of the Government and the bravery of our troops, overthrew and extinguished the rebellious State governments. There then existed no link by which those States as States were connected with the Federal Government. In order to renew that connection it was necessary that State governments should be set up. This was admitted by everybody, and the President of the United States, acting under this admitted fact, undertook to organize State governments. In my judgment he had no authority to enter upon that work. The Constitution of the United States confers upon the President no implied powers; he has only express powers. The implied powers are all conferred upon Congress, and Congress is to pass the necessary laws to carry out the powers vested in the President or in any other department of the Government. He cannot frame the laws by which to carry into effect any of the powers conferred upon him.

But, sir, he undertook through provisional governors, whom he appointed to organize State governments in order to restore the connection between the rebellious States and the Union, which had been broken for five years. Now, had the President's plan succeeded, had he succeeded in organizing State governments that were loyal to the Union, that were under the control of loyal men, that protected loyal citizens and secured freedom to all the inhabitants in those States, Congress might and doubtless would have overlooked the manner of their organization and recognized them as restored to their former relations, because Congress is as anxious and the people of this country are as anxious as the President himself ever was or can be for the complete restoration of the States of the Union to their former relations upon equitable, fair, and honorable terms. But, sir, the people of this country are not willing that the rebellious States shall continue to be ruled over by rebels and Union men be persecuted for their loyalty.

This memorial shows that the State organizations in Louisiana, or the political organizations as they are called, are not republican; and it states, moreover, that the loyal men who assisted the Government to put down the rebellion are in the condition of a vanquished party; that murders and persecutions of loyal men are increasing in frequency and turpitude, and that they cannot obtain justice in the civil courts or adequate military protection.

I am also informed by a gentleman from Alabama, who has placed in my hands an official report made by the treasurer of the State of Alabama, that taxes have been imposed by the political organization in that State, and money collected and appropriations of that money made to pay the salaries of the rebel officers who ruled that State during the rebellion. To Governor Watts thousands of dollars have been paid within the last year out of money collected by taxation off the loyal people of the State.

Mr. HOWARD. If my friend from Illinois will allow me I will refer him to the authority, if there be any authority for that mode of levying taxes. He will find it in the circular letter which the Secretary of State addressed to the various provisional governors in the rebel States some time in the month of June, 1865, directly giving it as his opinion that the provisional governor had authority to levy taxes for the purpose of paying his own expenses and the expenses of the Legislature that was about to be called together.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the case I am stating goes back of that. Money has been collected within the last year, as I understand, in the State of Alabama and paid, not to the provisional governor appointed by the President, not for the expenses of the Legislature he convened, but to pay the salary of the rebel governor while the war raged; and I am told by an officer who served in the Union Army, and who previously fled from his home in Alabama to avoid conscription into the rebel ranks, that the officer by whose orders he was pursued, his home destroyed, and his family turned homeless upon the world, has been paid within the last year his salary as an officer for doing these very things; and he gives me this official document, the treasurer's report, showing the payment of the money.

Now, sir, how long is this condition of things to last? How long is the Congress of the United States to sit here and allow its loyal citizens, men who fought to sustain the Government, to be persecuted for their loyalty, to be taxed to pay the salaries of the men who persecuted them?

And, sir, I am told by delegations from North Carolina and Alabama and Louisiana and Texas, intelligent gentlemen, that the Union men of those States must leave them unless something is done for their protection, that they can get no justice in the courts, and that they have no protection for life, liberty, or property.

I know the President claims that these States are already restored to their former position in the Union, that he has done it. I have already commented upon the want of power in the President to do any such thing. But he constantly refers in his arguments upon this question to the fact that the postal and the revenue and the judicial systems are extended over these rebellious States, and he seems to suppose he extended them there. Why, sir, the President has had nothing to do with extending the postal and revenue laws and the judicial system over the rebellious States. They extended there all the time of the rebellion. Every general law of Congress extended over the rebellious States as much as over the loyal States, but that did not restore their connection with the Union. Their connection was broken by the destruction of their State organizations, without which it could not exist. The citizens of those States are amenable to our laws and were all the time of the war. The law itself extended over them all the time, and there has been no extension of it by the President. It was not in his power to extend the laws of Congress beyond the limit where the laws themselves go.

These political organizations which he has been instrumental in organizing are merely auxiliary to the military power, and he has treated them so himself all the time whenever they have done an act interfering as he thought unjustly or improperly with the military control of the country. This shows exactly what they are; they are political organizations subordinate to the military power, and in my judgment entirely within the control of Congress. We can control the military power there; and the President of the United States, although he is by the Constitution Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy, must command the Army and the Navy according to the rules and regulations which the law prescribes for his government. He can carry his powers into execution only in accordance with such laws as Congress thinks proper to enact.

The duty of Congress, in my judgment, is, if this state of facts be true as alleged, to interfere at once and set aside these political organizations which are oppressing loyal men and are managing the affairs of these States in the interest of the very men who sought to overturn and destroy this Government. The people of Louisiana—that is the particular case—must accept the fate that awaits all people who unjustly and wickedly engage in war and are defeated. They are at the mercy of the Federal Government of the United States of America; and the Congress of the United States is vested with authority to pass all laws necessary to carry into execution all powers intrusted to this Government. Then, sir, I think it should exercise this power and pass the necessary laws to secure to Union men and loyal citizens their rights in these rebellious States, the necessary laws to place them in authority and control so that they may have protection, and secure to all republican liberty.

And now, sir, commending this memorial to the serious and early attention of the joint committee on reconstruction, I move that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I have but a word to say to the honorable Senator from Illinois. He certainly has taken a very extraordinary occasion to deliver his speech in exposition of the merits of the petition which he has presented. I presume that the honorable Senator, though he has addressed his speech to the Senate, intends it to reach to the Legislature of Illinois, and to influence a certain election that is shortly to come off there. If that be his object, I hope the honorable Senator will succeed in it. I have read the names of the competitors of the honorable Senator from his own party for his succession, and I religiously believe that he is a much abler and a much better man than any of them or all of them together, if they could all be made into one man. [Laughter.] I therefore hope that when that election comes off the honorable Senator will be reelected. I am satisfied that he will bring more ability to the seat which he is to vacate on the 3d of March than any one who has been named, and I am equally satisfied that, although the modicum of disinterested and unselfish patriotism which he will bring will not be very large, it will still be immensely greater than that which any of the others will bring.

In relation to the memorial which the honorable Senator has presented, and the matters of complaint embodied in it, I have only to say that in my judgment it amounts simply to this: there are in the States to which he refers an insignificant number of Radicals—I do not speak of their respectability, but of their numbers. They are too insignificant to grasp the governments of those States, and they just petition Congress to put those States into commission, establish a government to be managed by commissioners, and in effect pray to be made those commissioners themselves. That is about the sum and substance of the whole thing.

In the remarks which I have made I intend no discourtesy to the honorable Senator from Illinois. I feel great personal respect for him. I appreciate his ability as a Senator, as a lawyer; I believe he is a much better man than most of the men with whom he is associated, and who act in connection with him in the country; and therefore I greatly desire, when his successor is to be elected, that he shall be his own successor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Kentucky cannot rise above personal considerations in the discussion of questions in this body. I thank him for his personal kindness to me, and hope to be on terms of personal friendship with him while we occupy seats here; but I have never been guilty of indulging in a reflection upon the motives of Senators in their discharge of public duty here, and I am sorry that the Senator from Kentucky is cast in such a mold that he supposes that when a brother Senator takes a particular course here it is done in reference to his personal standing. I think, sir, if I know myself, that I have been governed in my action in this body by a sense of public duty, and that there is nothing in my course to warrant the Senator from Kentucky in casting upon me any such imputation as that of making a speech for the purpose of securing a reelection to the Senate. Sir, he may be cast in such a mold that he would do it; I am not. If my public course here is not such as to meet with the approbation of my constituents, I must take the consequences. I have not shaped it in reference to securing the personal approbation of my constituents further than a faithful discharge of public duty may be regarded as having that tendency; and the imputation of the Senator from Kentucky is wholly unwarranted.

Mr. DAVIS. One solitary word—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. I will just say a word in explanation to the honorable Senator from Illinois by the indulgence of the Senate, not detaining them a minute. The honorable Senator best knows and he is the best judge whether, if he be animated by a desire to secure his reelection, he is animated by a dishonorable motive. I leave the decision of that question with him: I have nothing more to say.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is House bill No. 828.

Mr. SHERMAN. A number of Senators have reports, &c., regular morning business, to make, and as the morning hour was consumed in debate I trust that a few minutes will be allowed for the disposition of that business. I therefore move, with the consent of the Senate, that ten or fifteen minutes be allowed for the disposition of regular morning business in its order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be governed by the intimation of the Senator from Ohio, unless objection be made, and receive reports, bills, &c., as though the morning hour had not expired.

Mr. WADE. I shall feel bound to object if there is anything that leads to argument.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean simply the regular morning business.

Mr. WADE. Very well.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to the motion to refer the petition presented by the Senator from Illinois, I did not understand that it was disposed of, but the discussion on that was interrupted by the calling up of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was so.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LANE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of John J. Anderson and John W. White, praying for compensation for cotton used for fortification purposes in the city of Nashville in 1862, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 475) to prevent and punish false and fraudulent representations to induce emigration to a foreign country, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I am also directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 148) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cyrus W. Field, to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. I desire to state that, with the indulgence of the Senate, I should like to call up this resolution to-morrow morning in the morning hour, and put it on its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of the Board of Trade of Detroit, Michigan, praying for an appropriation to defray expenses of transportation of articles from this country intended for exhibition at the Paris Exposition, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject-matter having been already disposed of; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Schmoele, praying for the suspension or repeal of the homestead act and the passage of a law by which the price of our public lands may be graduated, and the minimum price fixed at five or six dollars per acre, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Lynchburg, Virginia, praying that the Southern Institution for the Amelioration of the condition of the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind Negroes be exempted from taxation, as well as all articles manufactured therein, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the matter having been provided for in the internal revenue bill of last session; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a petition of female employes of the Treasury Department, praying for an increase of compensation, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, the subject having been disposed of at the last session; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Mary O'Connor, praying for the restitution of property in the town of Beaufort sold by the tax commissioners, or indemnity for the same, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. CATTELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia, praying for the promotion of numismatic science and antiquarian research, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for an appropriation to build two new piers and repair the old wharves at Marcus Hook, on the Delaware river, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 479) to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 480) to equalize the distribution of the currency of the national banks in the several States and Territories; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. This bill proposes to equalize the distribution of the currency of the national banks among the several States and Territories. When the first bill on this subject was originally passed, it provided that the currency should be distributed among the several States upon a certain proportion, but a subsequent bill gave precedence to State banks, and in the State which I have the honor in part to represent we got almost none of the currency, because it was taken up by the State banks in the old States. This is a bill to equalize the distribution of the currency, and also to make an addition to the currency. I move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House providing for an adjournment from the 20th of December to the 3d of January.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 902) to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States;" and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CRAGIN. I rise to a question of privilege. I was necessarily absent last week when the District suffrage bill was passed. Had I been present I should have voted for the passage of the bill. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that my vote may be so recorded, if it is not inconsistent with the practice and rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question has often been made in the Senate, and under the rule of the Senate the Chair believes it has been uniformly decided that leave cannot be given. The Chair, however, will be corrected by the Senate if such is not the uniform rule.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 902) to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) relative to the issue of Agricultural College scrip to the States lately in rebellion, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, if there be no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have the resolution laid on the table and not referred to a committee at this moment. I think we can pass it without a reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table for the present.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No motion is necessary. It was only laid aside by unanimous consent. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 828) to repeal section thirteen of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. WADE. That is not the bill that we supposed was in order as the unfinished business. I move, therefore, to postpone that bill and all other orders, and proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of the State of Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] is entitled to the floor upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Maryland was a moment since called into the Supreme Court room, and he desired me to say, if this bill came up, that he wished to participate in the debate upon it, but did not expect the Senate to interrupt the order of business on his account, and he would participate in it perhaps at some other time.

Mr. WADE. We supposed the bill for the admission of Nebraska was the unfinished business. If it is not, I move that all other business be laid aside and that we proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union; the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BROWN, to insert at the end of the second section the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other rights, to any person by reason of race or color, and upon the further condition that this fundamental condition shall be submitted to the voters of the Territory of Nebraska at an election to be held on the first Tuesday of — next. And at such election said voters shall declare their assent to or dissent from the condition aforesaid in such form as shall be prescribed by the Governor of said Territory. And all votes given at such election shall be returned to such Governor within — days from the day of the election, who shall forthwith canvass the same. And if a majority of such votes shall be for this condition the Governor shall certify that fact to the President of the United States, who shall by proclamation announce the fact; whereupon, without further proceedings on the part of Congress, this act shall take effect.

Mr. WADE. This amendment contains a principle which I have been as earnest in advocating as any other member on this floor. I wish that principle prevailed over every State in this Union, and where it does not now prevail I trust it very shortly will. But still I have objections to it in this connection and as an amendment to this bill, for reasons that I do not now intend to consider at very great length, because most of what I wish to say on this subject I said on a former occasion when it was before the Senate.

It was argued by the Senator from Missouri and perhaps one or two other Senators, that there was a precedent for annexing such an amendment to a bill for the admission of a State, or an amendment limiting the power of the State when it should come into the Union; that there was such a precedent by what was called the Missouri compromise. Mr. Clay, I believe, on that occasion offered the provision which is cited as a precedent. That is my recollection of it, though I have not looked at it very lately. It was adopted; but I know that almost every eminent lawyer, jurist, and legislator, from that period to this, has supposed that that limitation was totally void, and void upon this reason, that all the States that have not committed treason must stand upon the same footing with regard to their relation to the General Government and their powers as States.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the Senator how a State can commit treason.

Mr. WADE. That question has been sprung many a time and has no significance. A State in one sense is a certain territory, but really the people are the State; all the rest is bare territory, land and water. The people within the limits of what we call the territory are the State. But I do not turn aside for any such quibble as that. The people representing each State or constituting each State must, as has always been supposed, stand upon the same platform of equality with regard to all their powers and all their relations to the General Government. This doctrine has been asserted on this floor during the period of the Government, and I do not know that anybody has ever controverted it.

Another kindred doctrine has been as universal and as unquestioned; and that is that the General Government has no power to fix the qualifications of voters in the several States. I mean all the time, those States that have been loyal and have never forfeited their rights. This amendment is not offered to alter the condition, as it is said, of a State in this Union, because Nebraska is a Territory seeking to be admitted into the Union as a State. That is very true; but, sir, does not the same doctrine apply to it that would if it were already a State? Will you do a vain and idle thing? For the moment you have attached that amendment and permitted the State to come in on that condition, if I am right in my reasoning, the next day she may alter her constitution and throw your amendment to the winds and fix the status of her own voters in her own way.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him whether, if that doctrine be true, he were to impose a restriction of this sort upon the States readmitted, that have heretofore been in rebellion, they could not do the same thing also; and how he distinguishes the power of the State thereafter in one case, and the power of the State thereafter in the other case?

Mr. WADE. That is a very pertinent question; and I propose to come to that without having my attention particularly drawn to it. I have been speaking of States that have never forfeited any of their rights; loyal States. The doctrine that I have asserted applies to them. I do not know that the Senator from Missouri will question these principles as applied to the States that have never been in rebellion or in any way forfeited their rights. I do not suppose at this time of day we can do it. I know of no leader of political parties, I know of no jurist from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court down to the judges of the county courts in the several States, that has ever asserted any other doctrine than that to which I have alluded.

The Senator from Missouri on a former occasion undertook, as did the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] also, to show that I was inconsistent with myself; that I was asking the Senate to do an act inconsistent with what they had done on a former occasion, when we all voted to fix the elective franchise in this District. Why, sir, there is no analogy between the two cases at all. Our power of legislation over the District of Columbia is plenary and supreme. There is no doubt on that question whatever. It is given us by the Constitution of the United States. The distinction that I make between that and this measure is barely this: that with regard to Congress passing a law to fix the qualifications of voters in a State that has not been in rebellion, we have no power whatever to do it; whereas our power to fix that status in this District is full, plenary, and supreme; there is nobody to question it. There is, therefore, no analogy between the two cases whatever.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to a point right there?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I will ask my friend whether or not, in his opinion, Congress may not in its discretion refuse to admit a State into the Union at a particular time? Is not that discretion in Congress? If so, I would ask, when would there be a better occasion for its exercise than at this moment with regard to Nebraska, when it comes here with a constitution in defiance of the principles of the Declaration of Independence?

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, the first part of the Senator's question is a very simple one; and I hardly supposed that he would put it. The very fact that we stand here, deliberating upon the question whether we shall admit a State or not, presupposes that we have the power either to admit or reject her, as shall appear best to the majority on this floor. There is no question about that. Our power to reject a State making application here is as full and perfect as our power to admit her if we think she ought to be admitted. As to the expediency of it, I endeavored on a former occasion to give the Senate at some length the reasons that induced me to believe that it was highly proper, expedient, and necessary that these Territories should be admitted now. I may be compelled to allude to some of those reasons again; but I am not in the habit of repeating myself on this floor. When I have stated the reasons once, I always think it is a little impertinent to go over them again, and I do not know that I could make the case appear any stronger on a second running than over than I did before. But I have no embarrassment upon that subject, and I shall answer the question before I get through.

When we admitted the State of Tennessee at the last session no such question was raised on this floor that I remember. It was not then suggested that we should refuse to admit her until she agreed to let us fix the status of her voters. Of course we looked to the effect upon her in that respect of the constitutional amendment when it should be adopted; and as it was, as the constitutional amendment had not then become a part and parcel of the Constitution of the United States, we indeed admitted that State without putting any condition at all upon the qualification of electors. Now, I will ask the Senator, is it not well for us to deal as leniently with a most patriotic State who sends Representatives here the best qualified that you can find, gentlemen some of whom have participated in the war, who have run all the hardships and the hazard of that great controversy for the maintenance of this Union—ought we not to deal as leniently with such a Territory knocking at our doors to come in as a State, as though she had been in rebellion and two thirds of her people had been endeavoring night and day to overturn your Government and to erect an accursed slave government upon its ruins? I will not submit, if I can help it, to any such discrimination as that.

Now, sir, I want to remind gentlemen how some of us voted on that question, because this amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is not one of first impressions, it is not a new principle upon this floor, it is understood by us all.

Mr. BROWN. It was adopted in 1820.

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir. It was sought to be applied again, not in exactly the words in which the Senator has embodied his amendment, but the principle was precisely the same, as an amendment to the joint resolution for the admission of the State of Tennessee. I wish Senators to attend to the action that was had then, because they will not suppose that I am the advocate here now of any new doctrine. I wonder that when this question was so emphatically settled as it was then it should be made a question here now. When that resolution admitting Tennessee—if you please to call it admitting—or restoring her relations with this Government, as the resolution asserted, was before the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts sought to attach this amendment to it:

"Provided, That this shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State there shall be no denial of the electoral franchise or of any other rights on account of color or race, but all persons shall be equal before the law, and the Legislature of the State by a solemn public act shall declare the assent of the State to this fundamental condition and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of such assent whenever the same shall be adopted, upon the prompt receipt whereof, he shall, by proclamation, announce the fact, whereupon, without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, this joint resolution shall take effect."

Now, sir, there was an endeavor to give the right to the colored people to vote in the State of Tennessee and to make that a condition on which she should be restored to her relations to the Union. I desire the attention of Senators who may not recollect how this important resolution was voted upon, to the names of those who voted for and against it. I trust that gentlemen are not about to change their front now. There is nothing in my judgment which ought to lead to any such change, for this is a much stronger case in the direction I argue it than the one that was up here last year. The yeas and nays were taken on this proposition, and resulted—yeas 4, nays 84; as follows:

"Those who voted in the affirmative are Messrs. Brown, Pomeroy, Sumner, and Wade—4."

I voted for it myself last year. I voted for just such an amendment as you have got here.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope you will vote for it always.

Mr. WADE. Well, sir, that would be giving great weight to my judgment to overrule thirty-four Senators by it. But let us now see what the weight of authority was against me on that occasion.

"Those who voted in the negative are Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Cresswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Kiddle, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—84."

There you had almost the whole Senate against such a qualification to the admission of the State of Tennessee, a rebel State that came here, not complying even with the requisitions of your constitutional amendment. This Territory has not adopted, but I pledge my word and my honor that she stands ready, just as soon as you shall admit her into this Union, the very next day, if her Legislature is in session, to adopt your constitutional amendment. There is no doubt about it. Everybody from that quarter says so. The respectable, truthful gentlemen who have been sent here to represent that Territory as Senators on this floor, their Delegate in the other House, the letters I have received from all the officers of the State everywhere, announce the fact that this Territory is up to high-water mark on the subject of human rights. I want them here because I want this body strengthened immensely by the reinforcement that these gentlemen will bring to bear upon every question you can get up; and you stand here cavilling over a mere technicality. There is nothing else about it. They also inform me that all their influence as men, strengthened and enforced by the elevation into the magistracy, if you will give them a chance, shall be exerted to see that this ghost of an objection shall be removed. And do you doubt that it will be? Not at all. It was not so with the State of Tennessee. You had no such assurances from that quarter. Nobody stood up on this floor giving you assurance that they would adopt your constitutional amendment and then give enfranchisement to all the colored population in the State. No such announcement as that was made; and yet thirty-four of you voted against requiring such an assurance. I failed to do it, because at that time I had not so fully investigated the principle upon which the Government moves, as I have since—the equality of the States, the impossibility of forcing these conditions upon a State which had not forfeited her rights, acting in accordance with the action of this Government from the earliest time. I went against it and gave that vote, prompted to do so by my zeal for fixing that qualification everywhere that we can.

Mr. BROWN. Do I understand the Senator to say that if he had that vote to give over again now, from further investigation he would not give it?

Mr. WADE. It might be that I would give it with regard to that State, a slave State when she came here. I surely would not give it as a condition to fix upon a free Territory when she comes here. It may be that I was right when I applied my doctrine to a slave State guilty of treason, and that had no rights except such as of grace we saw fit to bestow upon her. In that view of it, my vote was exactly right, and if I differed with my brethren here I still think that my vote was right. But when you come to apply the doctrine to another State having no more relation to that than light has to darkness, then, sir, I tell you frankly my vote would not be the same. I shall not vote to affix this qualification or this restriction upon the constitution of this State, because I know it is a mere technicality. I know the great principle for which we have so long contended will be infinitely further advanced by rejecting the amendment than by permitting it to defeat the admission of this most patriotic State. The Senator wanted to know how I could find any distinction between a State that had not forfeited her rights and one that had. If these southern States had never been in rebellion—

Mr. BROWN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not wish to be understood as occupying any such ground. I can make a very clear distinction between States that have and States that have not been in rebellion; but where I desired the Senator to point out the discrimination was between States that have forfeited their rights and those that are not States at all, but in a territorial condition.

Mr. WADE. Very well; that is no harder than the other. I knew that the sagacity of the gentleman, shrewd lawyer as he is, would find no difficulty in making the very discrimination that he asked me to make on this floor. Why, sir, nothing is more unlike than a State that has forfeited all her rights and one that stands with her head up, patriotic, influential, living up to your Constitution everywhere, and never having violated her faith with the General Government or with her own citizens. I am astonished that I should be asked to point out the difference. One, in my judgment, lies prostrate under the arm of the conqueror, who has the right by the public law, as announced by your Supreme Court, to impose just such conditions upon her as he pleases, always having reference to the humanities and civilizations of the present day, and living as near to the most liberal principles of government as you can and govern her; but the power to treat conquered territory is at the will of the conqueror always. Does it make any difference, in the great war in which we have been through, in favor of these rebellious States, that they were not a foreign nation with which we was at war, alien enemies, but domestic enemies converting themselves into aliens by their acts of rebellion and treason? All the publicists say that when an insurrection has risen to the proportions of a civil war, so as to create a de facto government which can control the whole population within the rebellious borders and set them against the original Government, there is no difference between the belligerent rights of contestants in such a war and in a foreign war. They proceed upon exactly the same principles. The power of the conqueror is precisely the same. All there is about their case is that in addition to being alien enemies they have added the accursed guilt of treason; that is all. And shall they be more leniently dealt with because they raised their arm against the most beneficent Government in the world and proved traitors, than if they had been a foreign enemy that had fallen into some misunderstanding with us that resulted in war? I tell you no.

I am not the advocate for proceeding against these rebel, criminal States with any greater rigor than is necessary to procure entire security for ourselves—indemnity for the past, if you please, and security for the future. I, for one, will exact nothing more; I will be content with nothing less. We have made a proposition to the rebellious States that has elicited the admiration of the world on account of its moderation, on account of every principle of revenge being withdrawn from it. We have put forth a principle of justice to them and justice to ourselves without any acrimony, without any attempt at punishment. When terms like those have been defiantly rejected by these men, murdering, scalping, destroying, construing every act of conciliation into cowardice, and raising their terms in exact proportion as you offer them lenity, I shall be for strong measures. Many of these States have rejected those most beneficent terms. They have not only rejected them but, as the Senator from Illinois has read to you this morning from the most authentic sources, they are now defying your law and murdering our friends in that country, whom we are bound by every principle that should actuate men to protect. Those who have been our friends in the southern States and have stood up for the old Government in the face of perils and hardships almost unequalled in the history of the world, have a right to call upon us to defend them; and, sir, they shall never want defense so far as I have it in my power to extend it. As these rebellious States have defied us and received all our attempts at lenity with mockery and defiance, I am for strong measures when these are rejected. They have been rejected now, I believe, by more than half of those States. I wish they could have complied with the most lenient and beneficent terms that we offered them. I told you on a former occasion I would receive them if they would take those terms, which were not as severe as I believed were necessary. I feared when proposed that they were not stringent enough to curb the proud, haughty recklessness of those men; but they have refused to comply with those terms, and have thereby shown themselves even more incorrigible and depraved than any of us supposed.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask my friend just whether, in his opinion, those governments down there are valid so that they can bind their States or become parties to a constitutional amendment?

Mr. WADE. I have thought of that. Nobody knows better than the Senator how strenuously, to the utmost of my ability, I contended against the constitutionality of these organizations even under Mr. Lincoln himself. Everybody who was here, cognizant of the doings of this Senate, will bear me witness how I endeavored to anathematize this attempt by the executive arm alone, with only military power, to set up governments there without consulting Congress. The Senator knows what my opinions were then, and I assure him they have not changed since. The fact that these principles have been carried still further, and with more effrontery have been attempted to be forced upon Congress by Andrew Johnson, has not made them any more palatable to me.

Mr. SUMNER. Then if this is—

Mr. WADE. I have not answered your whole question yet. I have only attempted to show you that the question is not new, that my advocacy of the principle that the Executive cannot set up such a power is not a new principle for me. I wondered that every man who wished to preserve the true balances of our Constitution did not rise up then and anathematize the act, come from what quarter it would. I stand to-day where I stood then, only with greater experience on the subject, and when I see a despotism attempted to be erected on these principles, more stubbornly opposed to it if possible than I was then. But these governments not being constitutional, how can you ingraft these principles upon them? Why, sir, it is in the power of this Congress, who have the full power of reconstruction. This is the body that can do it, and no other has under the Constitution any right whatever over it. You ask me the question: if these are disorganized States in their inception; the fruits of usurpation of the Executive power, how can you make them active? Why, sir, this Congress can breathe the breath of life into these dead carcasses. They did so by the constitutional amendment. They had their all-prevailing power of Congress to revivify and give life to that which without it is dead. That is how I answer you. Have you as a lawyer anything against that doctrine that these institutions, being set up in usurpation, were void; but is it not in the power of Congress, who has entire jurisdiction over the whole subject, to make them good by a constitutional amendment such as you ought to propose to them? That is what you said to them: "preserve these institutions as they are, and give us action under them, and we will sanction what you have done as legal and right." Without our action they are void and of no account whatever. That is the way I answer you.

Mr. President, I am anxious for a vote on this subject and do not intend to prolong the argument; but I am asked as to the expediency of this measure. I cannot repeat with any more force than my colleague did, and as I attempted to do on a former occasion, that we did promise these Territories that on certain conditions which we prescribed being complied with, they might knock at our doors with a constitution republican in form, and we would admit them. That is the sense of what we did. These doctrines that you now advocate were not thought of then. They have sprung into life since. You made your promise and agreement without prescribing at the time the rule that you now seek to enforce upon them. If you had, I have no doubt they would have complied with it, for I have no question that they are as anti-slavery, as much imbued with the sense of human rights, and wish as devotedly that all their population should have the elective franchise as you or I do. I have no question about that. But there they are in the winter time with the snows mid-leg deep, drifted all over their prairies, their rivers frozen up and unnavigable, their roads blocked up, intercommunication between them almost impossible, and now you propose to impose the expense of an election on those poor people scattered all over those immense territories. You wish now to send this Constitution back and put them to the trouble and expense of doing that which you did not ask them to do at the time. Having complied with all the conditions that you did prescribe, you now wish to send it back and compel these poor people to go through all this expense, all this terrible exercise, before you will let them in here. Sir, I do not think you have any right to do it. I do not see how States which stand on the same footing, having the word "white" in their constitutions, can without a blush demand of others that which they do not do themselves. I cannot do it for Ohio. I have told you that as a citizen of Ohio, which has a constitution just like that of Nebraska in this respect, I want it altered. I think it a defect just as much as you do. I have no doubt it will be done, and done quicker than though you should commence war upon her to compel her to do it.

They have all the population that is necessary; they have all the elements of a great and prosperous State; they are going on with all those enterprises that have made the American people so great; and a more enterprising race (for I have been among them) is not to be found in this most enterprising nation anywhere. Why distrust them? Be generous to them as you have been to everybody else. When you come to a State that has forfeited her rights, so that I have a right to ingraft my principles upon her, I will go hand in hand with you everywhere; but I cannot agree with you in exacting of these people over your own agreement and your own promises, that they shall ingraft upon their constitution a provision that is not in your own, and one that never was exacted yet of any State by Congress. You did not ask them to do any more than they have done. I say again they have all the elements of a State; and all those principles that have been adjudged in the past sufficient to justify the admission of a new State into the Union apply in this case. Now, why should they not be admitted? Can anybody tell me? Can any Republican tell me why he should shut out the influence that is justly and legally derivable from this source? Why should he shut out the reinforcement he will get by doing justice to this Territory? The dictates of justice, the dictates of policy, the strength of the great cause of human rights for which we contend, will all be subserved by her admission; and as you rejected in the case of Tennessee just such a provision as it is now sought to ingraft on this Territory, I ask gentlemen to pause.

I suppose I need not have argued this matter so earnestly, because you have passed upon it once. It is not many months ago since this same question was before you, and you passed a bill for the admission of Nebraska by an overwhelming majority. What has transpired since to make it necessary that we should get up here and reargue the question? Why not do now what your sense of justice prompted you to do then?

I trust, sir, that any further appeals from me are entirely unnecessary. I have no idea that any Senator upon this floor will change his vote because of anything that has transpired between that day and this, though the fact is that further light has dawned upon us with regard to this Territory, and all of it going to show its immense resources and its immense gain in population from the time we had its application under consideration before. Why not deal with it as you have dealt with every other Territory applying for admission? There is no legal objection, there is no moral objection, but everything should prompt us to overlook these little technicalities for the great good that we seek to ingraft upon our constitutions.

I do not think, Mr. President, of anything more that I ought to say. I want a vote upon this bill to-day if it is possible to do it.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, this is a question upon which I feel a very great degree of interest, and that feeling has been heightened and increased by the speech which has just been made by the honorable Senator from Ohio and the views which he has given upon the nature of the work in which we are engaged. Now, sir, what is it? The proposition before the Senate is to create a State; to make out of the people of Nebraska and the Territory of Nebraska, its snow-covered prairies and its ice-bound rivers, a State. Then, Mr. President, what is a State? Something or nothing. If something, it behooves us, the representatives of the people here, and the representatives I might say of States, and of States claimed to be sovereign States, that we should know well what we do. I ask again what is a State? If we have power to create a State at all; if we have authority and jurisdiction to make it, then that State must be a body-corporate, not a thing existing as an actual, substantial entity, but a legal artificial person existing only in contemplation of law, and which for certain purposes enumerated in the law and designated by the law is to be taken to be a person. Then, in that sense, the people of the Territory of Nebraska may be taken to be corporators; the State of Nebraska is the corporation, the legal person created by this bill and who is to have perpetual existence, to sue and be sued, and to perform all other functions which are usually performed in law by a natural person. I do not know that I follow strictly the legal definition of a corporation, but I apprehend that lawyers at least will comprehend what I mean.

In the creation of a corporate body of this kind, it becomes of the utmost importance that we should inquire what powers it may have. As a usual rule, they extend only to the boundaries of the charter which creates the corporation, or in other words they have no power to do that which the law of their creation does not allow them to do. So far I am willing to go. I am willing to join in the creation of a State limited in its powers in this way; but if a corporation is to be created with powers extending beyond the limits of that instrument which creates it, and to be invested with larger and wider powers, then I object; and it is to this point that I desire to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Ohio particularly.

I put the question to him whether a State could commit treason. I shall not undertake to give his answer, simply because I cannot; there was nothing about it of which my memory took hold; and, of course, to avoid any disposition to misrepresent him I will leave that to those who shall read the Globe to-morrow morning. I certainly understood the honorable Senator however to say that a State could commit treason.

Mr. WADE. No; I did not say any such thing.

Mr. COWAN. Does the honorable Senator say now that it cannot?

Mr. WADE. It is perfectly evident to me that many gentlemen have found that States may commit treason and sympathize with traitors; but the State itself being incorporeal, as Lord Coke says, having no soul—(Mr. COWAN. Nor body)—can neither go to heaven nor commit treason, nor go the other way that I know of. I said no such thing, however.

Mr. COWAN. I have always been delighted to agree with my ancient friend; and knowing him to be a most learned and astute lawyer, I have always felt myself strengthened when that agreement took place; and I was really somewhat shocked when I found or supposed I had found him advocating a different theory. But I propose to go a little further; it may be that he is hardly out of the woods yet.

If a State cannot commit treason, if it has no soul to be damned and no body to be kicked, I should like to ask further whether it can commit any other crime. I should like to know from the honorable Senator as a lawyer whether this corporation, this incorporeal thing as he admits it to be, has any power or can do anything other than that which the charter of its incorporation allows it to do, because that is a most important and pertinent inquiry here; a most ponderous inquiry, an inquiry which to-day rives this nation from foundation-stone to turret, which shakes it from the steeple to the cellar, can a State commit a crime? Can a State rebel? I say, Mr. President, I want to know this, and I want to know it for a most potent reason, for one that is all-important. I in my State am in a minority; in my State I am at the mercy of the State authorities, who believe differently from me, who are of a different opinion, who hold to different views of policy, and I desire here now at this time and in this place to know how far I am bound by those State authorities.

I understand that the Governor of Pennsylvania, a most respectable gentleman, whom I see upon this floor now, is limited in his power and in his authority by the Constitution and the laws; that the Legislature of Pennsylvania are so limited; that the judges are so hedged round about by the law; so that they have no right to do that as Governor, as Legislature, as judicial officers, as corporate officers, if you please—representatives of this incorporeal thing about to be created here—that they have no authority as such officers to do that which is not warranted in and by the Constitution and the laws.

Mr. President, I want to know if that is true in these United States of America; I want to know if that is a fundamental principle; because if it is not all our rights are in jeopardy. If these corporate officers can in their own persons transcend their corporate powers, step outside of their limits, do unlawful things, and involve me in the consequences, I want to know it, I want to know, and I want to know it from the honorable Senator from Ohio, whether if his excellency the Governor of Pennsylvania, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and the judiciary of Pennsylvania were to declare that the State of Pennsylvania was out of the Union and inaugurate a war to maintain that theory, I who maintained that she was not out of the Union, and who persisted in my loyalty and my direct allegiance to the United States all the way through; could possibly be involved. That is the plain question, there is no blinking it, there is no getting around it. If the State can commit treason, then the State may involve me in the consequences of treason; then, the State may affect me because she has in her corporeal, not in her incorporeal, but in her corporeal, actual state and entity committed a crime; and I, forsooth, an humble member of the minority, must submit to it and must bear the penalty consequent upon it.

I have said that this was the question which now shook this nation to its center. I have said that this was the question of this age and this day. Is it true or is it not true? Of whom are we followers here? Are we the followers of John C. Calhoun; are we the advocates of nullification; are we the advocates of secession; or are we the followers of Daniel Webster and that school which declared that this Constitution of ours was not a compact or agreement, but an ordinance which created a Government? In what way is the citizen of Nebraska to be bound to the General Government of these United States? Is he to be bound to that Government by direct, immediate, personal allegiance, or is he to be bound, as was contended by the secessionists, through his State? They contended that he was not tied, that there was no ligamen, allegiance in lawful English, holding him directly to the General Government, and that he was bound to it only through his State. If that were true, and his State did something which cut off that ligamen, which cut off that bond of connection, the inhabitants of the State would be cut off, too. But if the tie was direct, immediate, and personal the action of the State would and could have no effect whatever on the status of the individual as to the General Government.

Hence it is, Mr. President, that I say this is the important question of the hour; this the test question of the day. It is upon the determination of this question that the existence of this Union hangs to-day trembling in the scale. I agree with what the honorable Senator from Ohio has said about the right of suffrage; I agree with the main part of his speech; but I do not agree with his notion, as I understand him, that a State may commit treason, that a State in rebellion may forfeit the rights of innocent people. And I put it to his sense of justice, I put it to his sense of humanity, I put it to that sense of right which I know exists in him toward the loyal people of this country, to know whether their States by any unlawful act of theirs can deprive their innocent people of their rights?

Mr. WADE. I have no wish to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to suggest to him that it seems to me that all he is saying now has no reference whatever to the question before the Senate. He is talking about a State and what is a State and what a State may do. I am not so particular as to what a State may or may not do; but I say, here is a State erected, with a complete organization, with all its officers, everything necessary to a State government, and which all the other States have, and it asks to come into this Union. But the Senator is speculating on the question whether a State can commit suicide or commit crime, or what it may or may not do. Sir, I suppose that this State, once admitted into the Union, can do exactly what the other States in the Union can do—no more, and no less.

Mr. COWAN. I agree that my honorable friend as a good lawyer has a right to object to the testimony on the ground of irrelevancy; but my experience in the Senate of the United States has taught me that irrelevancy in argument is at least not out of order. I think if it were we should have much less speaking here than we have been obliged heretofore to listen to. But is this relevant, or is it not relevant? My honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. Brown] has undertaken to offer an amendment to this bill, in which he attempts to limit and to restrain the power of this incorporeal person which we are about to create; and when he offers that amendment, which is perfectly legitimate, perfectly germane to the subject, I have a right to speak as to other things which this corporation may, according to the theories of Senators upon this floor, do or which it may not do. My honorable friend from Missouri makes a point which I do not make because, being a free man as he is and being a free man as I am, we each entertain our own opinions upon that.

The honorable Senator from Missouri proposes an amendment in which he says that this State shall at no time have authority to debar anybody from the right of suffrage on account of race or color. I respect his convictions on that subject, although I do not entertain them. I have no sneers or jibes for him; far from it; but I desire to hear him calmly, dispassionately, and carefully, and if his argument convinces my reason I shall vote with him.

On the other hand, I want to know, and I want to know as an essential, particular thing in this debate, whether this being which we are about to create shall have the power to take the whole of the people of Nebraska out of this Union. I want to know whether the Governor and the Legislature and the judiciary of Nebraska or a majority of the people of Nebraska, acting through a convention regularly called, if you please, according to law, can take the whole people of Nebraska out of the Union; whether they can cut the tie of allegiance which binds them to the Union; whether they can absolve all that people from punishment for crimes done to the Union; whether they can make all the citizens in that State quasi foreigners and alien enemies?

Now, Mr. President, I have always understood that it was utterly impossible for a corporation to commit a crime. I never heard of a railway company committing larceny. I never heard of a turnpike company committing burglary.

Mr. HOWARD. Nor trespass?

Mr. COWAN. No, sir, nor trespass. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon. If they commit a trespass they commit it in pursuance of the provisions of their charter; that is, in transcending the powers of their charter they may commit a trespass; but they cannot commit a crime. I should like to hear my honorable friend from Massachusetts demonstrate how it is possible for a corporation to commit suicide. I can very well understand how a man may commit suicide; I can understand how the corporeal entities, beings, who are the support of the trust and who are intrusted with the administration of it can commit a crime, how they can incur penalties, how forfeitures might be declared with regard to them; but how the corporation itself, this thing which exists in contemplation like the dagger in the drama, can commit a crime, and how any act of those who represent it can involve innocent people in the consequences, passes my comprehension.

I understand that the theory of my honorable friend from Massachusetts is that because the corporate authorities of the rebellious States were guilty of certain offenses therefore the States themselves committed suicide. I understand the doctrine of my honorable friend from Ohio to be that because the States went into rebellion—or rather not the States, for the States had no authority to go, but because their Governors, their Legislatures, and their judges went into rebellion—therefore the States incurred forfeitures. What forfeitures? Not the forfeitures which the law imposed upon individuals, but forfeitures which it is pretended we can impose on a State, on a whole people. If that be the doctrine, it becomes of the most intense importance; negro suffrage pales beside it; female suffrage sinks into insignificance before the magnitude of the question so far as it regards us.

I beg Senators to ponder on this question. If it be true, as I said before, that the corporate authorities of my State can by violating the provisions or the charter of that State, can by violating the laws of the Union and the Constitution of the Union involve me in any way in crime, I want to know it; and I want to know whether, if it can be so, it is upon any other principle under heaven, upon earth, or among men, except that these States are sovereign. If my State is a sovereign State, and if I am covered up in her vessel, inclosed in her basket, only attached to the Union by a ligament which attached her—if that is so, and I am to be involved in the consequences of her corporate wrongs; her corporate faithlessness; her infidelity to her vows, I want to know it. And I say, Mr. President, again, that this is the most important question which has ever been presented to any people. Here we have a central Government, a Government of the Union. I owe it allegiance. How? When? Where? How far? Is it absolute, or is it qualified? Is it immediate, or is it through somebody else?

If we leave this question as we have it now, what is a man to do? Here is a double Government, a double sovereignty, a double allegiance. I owe allegiance to the United States of America, and I owe allegiance to the State of Pennsylvania. I am told by honorable gentlemen that I owe allegiance to the General Government within its constitutional sphere, and I am told that I owe allegiance to the State of Pennsylvania within its reserved sphere. Who is to draw the line, pray? When am I to stop obeying the United States Government and to begin to obey the State of Pennsylvania? When am I to stop obeying Pennsylvania and to begin to obey the United States Government?

Mr. President, I wish to direct the attention of Senators to this fact in the Constitution of our Government, that it is an anomaly. There is no other Government on the earth situated as this is; there is no other double Government, no other double sovereignty, no other double allegiance; and when you undertake to talk about people being rebels and traitors, and guilty of the highest crimes known among men, it were well that we have the lines fixed so that you and I may not stumble and incur these imputations.

Now, I ask again, is the allegiance of the people of Nebraska Territory, when they are admitted as a State into the Union, to be a personal, direct, and immediate allegiance to the Government of the United States? If it is, then I understand it; then, if I were a citizen of that State, I should understand it when it becomes a State. But if you leave it as it is now, I am free to confess that I do not understand it. I understand gentlemen upon this floor to be astride a dilemma. I understand them one moment to say that a man who follows his State into rebellion and into war is a rebel and a traitor; and I understand them in the next breath to turn around and say that he is a conquered victim, to hang over him not the penalties of treason, not the penalties of the municipal law, but to say to him "væ victis," "at the mercy of the conqueror." Which of these is your theory to-day? Which is it, I ask you? I ask it of Conservatives and I ask it of Radicals. Are you ready to answer it? You must take one or the other. If this allegiance to the United States is direct and immediate, by what right can you declare that States commit suicide, and that States go out of the Union, and that the whole people of a State, innocent and guilty, men, women, and children, irrespective of the part they took in the war, are criminal and to be held at your mercy? If on the other hand the tie is through the State, if it is not direct between the person and the Government, and if the person is not immediately responsible to the Government, then by what warrant do you consider a whole population as guilty of treason, as guilty of crime; and by what warrant do you undertake to impose municipal penalties and talk about punishment for treason? If hereafter the people of Nebraska should rebel, how are they to be treated? I have a right here to inquire what may be the fate of Nebraska. This is not the only point of time that we are to consider; this is not the only rebellion of which we are to take cognizance. The wise man will not confine himself to this particular point; he will not create precedents or hamper himself with laws which in the end may come back to torment the inventor.

I have, then, a right to see how this is to affect the people of Nebraska. The people of the southern States, who went into rebellion, want to know to-day how this question is to be settled. "What are we? Are we in the Union or are we out? Are we held by a direct allegiance, to it or are we held by an indirect, intermediate allegiance? Are we quasi foreigners and conquered people, or are we rebellious and traitorous citizens, having engaged in a useless and lawless war against our Government?" That is the question which troubles every hearth-stone at the South to-day. That is the question upon which the Union hangs, and it is upon the determination of that question whether the Union shall live or whether the Union shall die, whether the Union is buried beyond the power of the hand of resurrection to give it life, to breathe breath into its body again, or whether we are now filling up its grave with that hollow-sounding voice which indicates farewell, a last farewell upon the earth to those we love.

That, Mr. President, I say again, is the great question. I have an opinion upon that question. I have always held it. I have always supposed it was orthodox. I have always believed that the Constitution of the United States was not a compact between States, that it was not an agreement between States, but that it was an ordinance of the people, through their States, by which they created a Government; that it did not bind sovereignties to do or not to do certain things; that it did not leave to sovereignties to determine whether the compact was kept or whether it was broken, but that it was an instrument which established a Government with the right to command and the power to compel obedience, and to which the citizen owed direct and personal allegiance, and that if the citizen was guilty of an offense against it in the shape of levying war, he could be indicted and convicted of treason. I have always considered it to be a Government which had its hand upon the head of the citizen, a Government which levied taxes upon him without the intervention of his State, which sent its tax-gatherer into every nook and corner of the country; he visited every household, he made his requisitions there as though there had been no State government at all. As to the Post Office Department in the several States, it was immediately and directly in contact with the people. As to the bankrupt laws in the several States it was immediately and directly in contact with them. It was in contact with them because it was the organ of peace and war. It was the organ through which their relations with foreign countries were made, held, and maintained. It was, in short, Mr. President, a Government distinct and independent from the States, and able to exist without the States except as to this body.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my honorable friend from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I propose to ask a question of the honorable Senator, because I intend to discuss this question at some future day myself, and I wish to be enlightened by his superior wisdom. I ask the honorable Senator this question: when one of the southern States seceded from the Union and established an independent government, professedly independent and having the power to protect its citizens against the consequences of disobedience to the Federal Government, and the Federal Government not having the power to afford them protection, or failing to do so, did a citizen of one of those States, yielding obedience to the commands of his State under those circumstances, thereby incur the penalties of the crime of treason against the Federal Government?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly not, Mr. President, no more than he would have incurred those penalties if he had been a citizen of a foreign State, no more than a citizen of Canada would have incurred them.

Mr. HOWARD. Who, then, did commit treason in a State?

Mr. COWAN. Those who could have been protected, only those; and I beg the country to note it, and I beg the country to observe that there is where they must come sooner or later.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose they defied all protection, and did not ask for it at all, who then committed treason?

Mr. COWAN. They committed treason who defied protection, of course. But why should the honorable Senator ask me that? Why should he attempt to traverse my answer in that way? I say to the honorable Senator that they who committed treason against the United States Government in levying war against it were those who made war against it, who conspired to make war against it, when they were not under the exclusive authority of a State government which had the power to compel their obedience, and when they were not acting under her commands, and when, at the time, the United States Government was upon the ground, and ready, able, and willing to protect them.

Mr. HOWE. How is it with prisoners of war who were taken by the rebels, reduced to their sole control and authority; would they be justified in changing their flag and enlisting in the rebel forces?

Mr. COWAN. If they were compelled. I believe at one time in his life the honorable Senator from Wisconsin was a judge, and I have no doubt a very good one; at least I am perfectly free to say that I should like to have tried cases before him. Now, let me suppose the honorable Senator presiding as a judge upon the trial of one of our soldiers taken prisoner by the rebels and compelled to bear arms against his country, would he allow him to be convicted of treason? To simply state the question is to answer it.

Mr. HOWE. I am so much of a judge yet that I think I can answer that question on the spot if it is submitted to me now.

Mr. COWAN. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. HOWE. I would never hold any man guilty of treason for doing anything that he was compelled to do; but while that answers the question of the gentleman, I think it is fair to say that I hold it to be the duty of every citizen of the United States to die before he takes arms against his country.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I bow in humble submission before the superior courage, patriotism, and magnanimity of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin—

"To die, and go we know not where;

To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot!"—

—the gentleman has not thought of death!

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that I imposed that duty only upon those honest citizens of the United States, all of whom know where they are to go when they die, not upon those who do not know where they are to go. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWAN. Then the honorable Senator has news from that—

"Undiscovered country, from whose bourne
No traveler returns."

Mr. HOWE rose.

Mr. COWAN. Oh, no! I beg pardon now. There is such a thing as "too much of a good thing," you know. If the honorable Senator has reduced it to a certainty, I congratulate him, and I congratulate all the citizens to whom he addresses himself. All those who are elected and who are confirmed in the faith of course know where they are going exactly.

Mr. WADE. I wish you would not forget Nebraska. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWAN. Well, I will come back to Nebraska directly.

Now, Mr. President, one word in regard to the law on this subject. It is certainly within the reach of any honorable Senator here to ascertain exactly what that is. There cannot be a doubt about it, because it is not only the law, but it is the common reason of man without which (unless we belong to such a perfect class of beings as my honorable friend from Wisconsin and those whom he apostrophizes, who would die in their tracks rather than falter) it would be impossible to get on. Until we come to that stage, I can say to the honorable Senator that the law is that where a man does owe direct, immediate allegiance, and where he acknowledges that he owes it, he has a right, a corresponding and reciprocal right, to demand from his Government to whom he owes it that it shall protect him, and that it shall not leave him to be overridden by any organization whatever; that it shall not leave him to be overridden by a State organization, by a county organization, by an organization of Knights of the Golden Circle, by an organization of precipitators, by an organization of minute-men, or any other kind of men, but that that Government is bound and it is the main object of its creation to be there ready to protect him if he refuses to obey that usurped power which attempts to command him.
